LET ME LINGER.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.
BY NEMO.

Let me linger! Let me linger!
Call me not so soon away,
Flowers are blooming o'er the landscape,
Birds are warbling on the spray—
Birds that have made blessed music,
Since my heart could feel its power;
Flowers that I have gathered yearly,
Since my earliest rambling hour!

Let me linger! Let me linger!
Can I leave the olden place,
Where each object, linked to memory,
Seems a fond, heart-loving face?
And the pathways where I've lingered,
Rapt in love's untold delight—
Can I leave them to a stranger,
Never more to greet my sight!

Let me linger! Let me linger!
In the shadow of that face,
Sleeps a loved one. Oh! how cherished,
Tears may speak that flow in vain!
Who will tend the gentle flowers,
When the grass they're springing o'er?
Who will know the priceless treasure,
To this heart, it always bore!

Let me linger! Let me linger!
And when Summer flowers are gone,
When we feel the blight of Autumn,
And the blessed birds have flown,—
Then my heart will tear asunder,
Time would keep it here for ayo—
When that grave has lost its greenness,
Then I'll meet ye far away!

MY AIN KIN.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Oh, these are na my ain kin,
These cruel false friends o' mine,
I'm weary for my ain kin,
An' friends of auld lang syne.
There are many faces round me,
Full bright an' fair to see,
But they ne'er can fill the place
Of my ain kin to me.

When gay my voice is ringing,
These simmer friends o' mine
Will gather close about me
And praise each word an' line;
But when the "dark hour" holds me,
And I cannna sing or lilt,
They'll gie a shrug at the heart,
These simmer friends o' mine.

Oh, weel I love my ain kin,
Those friends wi kind an' true;
They would not thus forsake me
Put wad clear close me too.
Oh, would that I were wi' you,
My friends of auld lang syne;
For I'm sae tired the fashion
O' these simmer friends o' mine. CLARA

FROM THE COLUMBIAN MAGAZINE.

LIFE IN AMERICA.

BY MISS MARIA J. MCINTOSH.

"Men and Manners in America" was the comprehensive title of a book issued some fifteen or twenty years ago, by a gentleman from Scotland, to whom, we fear, Americans have never tendered the grateful acknowledgments he deserved for his disinterested efforts to teach them to eat eggs properly and to give due time to the mastication of their food. This benevolently instructive work was the precursor of a host of others on the same or kindred topics. America has been a standard subject for the trial essays of European tyros in philosophy, political economy, and book-making in general. Society in America has been presented, it would seem, in all its aspects, religious, educational, industrial, political, commercial, and fashionable. Our schools and our prisons, our churches and our theatres, have been in turn the subject of investigation, of unqualified censure, and scarce less unqualified laudation.

The subject thus dissected, put together and dissected again, has not been able to forbear some wincing and on occasional outcry when the scalpel has been held by a more than usually unskilful hand—demonstrations of sensibility which have occasioned apparently as much disappointment as surprise in the anatomists. We flatter ourselves that there is peculiar fitness in the metaphor just used, for the outer form only of American life has been touched by these various writers. Its spirit, that which gives to it its peculiar organization, has evaded them as completely as the soul of man, the keenest investigations of the dissecting-room. Even of the soul of that spirit—of the point whence it sends forth its subtle influences, giving activity and direction to every member—of the nonsa at of society, of travel, and of those thousand incidents, disasters and disposal, which fortune scatters, three years passed rapidly away with the young, handsome and accomplished Bancroft.

One of the earliest caricatures of Horace Maitland's sale had been, that the striking presence of woman was necessary to the perfection of Maitland Park, and when Sir Thomas said to him, "Marry, Horace—do not be an old bachelor like your uncle," —though he answered nothing, he raved in the inmost recesses of his heart that it should not be his fault if he did not obey the injunction. Yet to the world it seemed wholly his own fault that at twenty-seven he had not given to Maitland Park a mistress, and even he himself could not attribute his continued celibacy to the coldness or cruelty of woman; for, in truth, though he had "knelt at many a shrine," he had "laid his heart on none." It hardly pressed for his reason, he might have said with Ferdinand,

> "For several virtues
> Have I liked several women; never any
> With so full soul, but some defect in her
> Did quarrel with the noblest grace she owned,
> And put it to the foil."

He who after the death of his uncle continued to urge Sir Horace most on the subject of matrimony, was the one of all the world who might have been supposed least desirous to see him enter into its bonds. This was Edward Maitland, a distant cousin somewhat younger than himself, to whom he had been attached from his boyhood, and who had been saved by his generosity from any of those painful experiences to which a very narrow income would otherwise have subjected him. It had more than once been suggested to Edward Maitland, that should his cousin die unmarried, he might yet unreasonably hope to become his heir, as he was supposed to be uncontrolled by any entail in the disposal of his property, and had few nearer relations than himself, and none with whom he maintained such intimate and affectionate intercourse. Nor could Edward Maitland fail to perceive that his own value in society was in inverse ratio to the chances of the Baronet's marrying, as a report or an actual proposal on the part of the latter had more than once occasioned a visible declension in the number and warmth of his invitations. These considerations appeared, however, only to stimulate the young man's activity in the search of a wife for his cousin. Had he been employed by a marriage broker with a prospect of a liberal commission, he could scarcely have been more indefatigable.

"Well, Horace," exclaimed the younger Maitland, as the two sat lostering over a late London breakfast one morning, "how did you like the lady to whom I introduced you last evening?"

A smile lighted the eyes of Sir Horace as he replied, "Very much, Ned—she is certainly intelligent, and has read and thought more than most ladies of her age."

"She will make a very useful woman, I am sure."

"And an agreeable companion," added Sir Horace.

"And a good wife—do you not think so, Horace?"

"Her doubtless would to one who could fancy her, Ned; for me her style is a little too pronounce."

"Well, really, Horace, I cannot imagine what you will have. One woman is too frivolous—another wants refinement—one is too indolent and exacting—and when you can make no other objection, why, her style is a little too pronounce!"—the last words were given with a tolerable imitation of his cousin's tone. "I an angel should be sent down from Heaven for you, I doubt if you would be suited."

"So do I," replied Horace, with a gay laugh at his cousin's evident vexation.

And thus did he meet all E'ward's well intended efforts. The power of choice had made him fastidious, and his life of luxury and freedom had brought him no experience of the meet or amiable and gentler self as a consoler. But that lesson was approaching.

A call from his lawyer for some papers necessary to complete an arrangement in which he was much interested had sent Sir Horace to Maitland Park, in the midst of the London season, to explore the yet undiscovered recesses of an old accessory of Sir Thomas. He had been gone but two days when Edward received the following note from him, written, as it seemed, both in haste and agitation.

"Come to me immediately on the receipt of this, dear Edward. I have found here a paper of the strangest importance to you and to me. Come quickly—take the chariot and travel post.

"Yours, H. D. MAITLAND."

In less than an hour after the reception of this note Edward Maitland was on the road, and travelling with the utmost expedition, he arrived at Maitland Park just as the day was fading into dusky eve.

"How is Sir Horace?" he asked of the man who admitted him.

"I do not think he seems very well, sir. You will find him in the library, Mr. Edward—shall I announce you, sir?"

"No," and with hurried steps and anxious heart Edward Maitland trod the well-known passages leading to the library.

When he entered that room Sir Horace was standing at one of its windows, gazing upon the landscape without, and so absorbed was he that he did not move at the opening of the door. Edward spoke, and, starting, he turned towards him a haggard with some yet untold suffering. He advanced to meet his cousin, and with an almost convulsive grasp of the hand, said, "I am glad you have come, Edward"—then, without heeding the anxious inquiries addressed to him by Edward, he rang the bell, and ordered lights in a tone which caused them to be brought without a moment's delay. As soon as the servant who brought them had left the room, Horace resumed. "Now, Edward, here is the paper of which I wrote to you—read it at once."

Agitated by his cousin's manner, Edward took the old stained paper from him without a word and seating himself near the lights, began to read while Sir Horace stood just opposite him, eyeing him intently. In a very few minutes Edward looked up with a puzzled air, and said, "I do not understand one word of it. What does it all mean, Horace."

"It means that you are Sir Edward Maitland—that you are master here—and that I am a beggar."

"Horace, you are mad!" exclaimed the young man, starting from his chair, with quivering limbs and a face from which every trace of color had departed.

Hitherto, the tone in which Sir Horace had spoken, the alternate fierce and pallid color on his face, and the shiver that had not usually passed over his frame, had shown him to be fearfully excited; but as Edward became agitated, all these signs of emotion passed away, and with wonderful calmness, taking the paper in his hand, he commenced reading that part of it which explained its purport. This was to secure the descent of the baronetcy of Maitland, and the property attached to it in the male line. Having made Edward Maitland comprehend this purpose, Sir Horace drew towards him a genealogical table of their family, and showed him that he was himself the only living descendant in a direct line through an unbroken succession of males from the period at which the original was made.

"And now, Edward," he said in conclusion, "I am prepared to give up everything to you. That you have no long been defrauded of your rights has been through ignorance on my part, and equal ignorance, I am convinced, on the part of my uncle. You know he paid little attention to business, leaving it wholly to his agents. I have often heard him express a wish to examine the papers in the old secretary in which I found this deed, as my father they had been sent home by old Harris when he gave up his business to his nephew—the old man writing to my uncle, that as they consisted of leases that had fallen in, or of antiquated deeds, they were no longer of any value except as family records. It was a just Providence that led me to that secretary to search for the missing title deeds of the farm I was about to sell."

Edward Maitland had sunk into his chair from sheer inability to stand, and for several minutes after his cousin had ceased speaking, he still sat with his elbows resting on the table before him, and his face buried in his clasped hands. At length looking up, he said, "Horace, let us burn this paper and forget it."

"Forget! that is impossible, Edward."

"Why—why not here as we have done? You speak of detracting me; but what have I wanted but you had? Has not your power been as my own? Your home—has it not been mine? It shall be so still. We will share the fortune, and as to the title, you will wear it more gracefully than I."

"Dear Edward! Such proof of your generous affection ought to console me for all changes, and it shall. I will confess to you that I have suffered, but it is past. My people—" his voice faltered, his chest heaved, and turning away he walked more than once across the room before he resumed—"they are mine no longer—but you will be kind to them, Edward I know."

"Horace, you will drive me mad!" cried Edward Maitland. "Promise, I require you, promise me to say nothing more of this."

He threw himself as he spoke into his cousin's arms with an agitation which Horace vainly sought to soothe until he promised "to spend" no further on this subject at present to any one. Satisfied with this promise, and exhausted by the emotions of the last hour, Edward soon retired to his own room. It was long before he slept, and had he not been in a distant part of the house, he would have heard the hurried steps with which for many an hour after he was left alone, Sir Horace Maitland continued to pace the floor of the dimly lighted library. The clock was on the stroke of three when he seated himself and began the following letter:

DEAR EDWARD:—I must go, and at once. I cannot without the loss of self-respect continue to play the master here another day, neither can I live as a dependent within these walls—no, not for an hour. Do not attempt to follow me, for I will not see you. I will write you as soon as I arrive at my point of destination—I know not yet where that will be. Feel no anxiety about me. I shall take with me a thousand pounds, and will leave an order for Decker to receive from you and hold subject to my draft whatever sum may accrue from the sale of the Park and the Manor, of Sir Thomas's personal property, which he had an undoubted right to will as he pleased, the amount of the money received from the sale of the last three years having been deducted therefrom. Do not attempt to force favors upon me, Edward—I cannot hear them now. Such attempts would only compel me to cut myself adrift from you and your affection—the one blessing that earth still holds for me.

My trunks have been packed for two days, for my first resolve was to go from this place and from England. I shall take the chariot in which you came down and fresh horses, but I will send them back by one from London.

God bless you, Edward. I dare not speak of my feelings to you now, lest I should lose the strength and self-command I have invoked since you.

H. D. MAITLAND.

Stealthily did Sir Horace move through the wide halls and attend the lofty stairs of this home of a life, leaving at every step the rushing tide of memory conflicting with the sad thought that he was treading them for the last time. Having reached his sleeping apartment, he rang a bell which he knew would summon his own man. Rapidly as the man moved, the time seemed long to him ere the summons was obeyed, and he hurried the necessary orders to have the carriage stopped and the trunks brought down as soon as possible, "and as quietly," he added, "as he did not wish to disturb Mr. Edward, who had retired to bed late."

"Will you not take breakfast, sir, before you set out?" asked the man.

"No, John. Let the carriage follow me; I shall walk on. Be quick and make no noise."

A faint streak of light was just beginning to appear in the east, when the Baronet quitted the mansion of his ancestors, and crept out into a world which held for him no other home. Accident, as about which material name events controlled by no human well, decided whether he should direct his course down the two beautiful avenues, and through the already mentioned "neighbor of old Harris"—determined to communicate his discovery to him, perhaps with some faint hope of learning the he entail had been in some way set at de, before Sir Thomas had ventured to make his sister's son his heir. Mr. Decker was not in his counting-house during hours to wait for him, he took up mechanically the morning paper that lay on his table. The first thing on which his eyes rested was the advertisement of a steam packet about to sail from Liverpool for America.

"America!—the very place for me. I shall meet no acquaintance there," was the thought that flashed through his mind. Another glance at the paper for the day and hour of the packet's sailing, an examination of his watch, he hurried out into the morning air and down the street, and again he mused, "I have not a moment to spare, and if I wait for Decker I may be kept for hours and so lose the packet; and why should I wait? Have I not seen the deed? This indecision is folly."

The result of these reflections was a note rapidly written to Mr. Decker stating his discovery of the deed of entail, his consequent surrender of all claim to the property to Edward Maitland, and his determination to quit England immediately. All arrangements respecting the settlement of his claims on the estate, and the claims of the present proprietor upon him, he left to Sir Edward and Mr. Decker, empowering the latter to receive and retain for his use and subject to his order, whatever, on such a settlement, should appertain to him.

This note was left on Mr. Decker's table, and in one hour after, Horace Maitland was advancing to Liverpool with the rapidity of steam. The packet waited but the arrival of the train in which he was a passenger, to leave the shores of England. With what bitterness he watched those receding shores, while memory vividly spread on his heart the bleeding heart the record of joys identified with them, and fading like them forever from his life, let each imagine for himself, for to such emotions no language can be justice.

A voyage across the Atlantic in now too common an event to stay, even for a moment, the pen of a narrator. From Boston, Horace—no longer Sir Horace—wrote to his cousin as follows:

DEAR EDWARD:—Here I am among the republicans, with whom I may find, I hope, myself I have nothing by sinking Sir Horace Maitland into plain Mr. Danforth. Such is now my address, assumed on my arrival here. I felt that should I give my real name I shall meet any to whom the name of Maitland is familiar, but because much of which I desire to be reminded is associated with that name. I said to you when leaving my home, dear Edward, "Do not fear me yet." I can now repeat it with better reason. The first bitterness of the shock of the change to which I was so suddenly subjected has been borne. M. past life already seems to me as a dream from which I have suddenly but effectually awakened. I am now fitted to begin life in reality.

The accounts of Decker, informational me to such there shows was a happy one. I cannot well dream one where all around me is active, vigorous life. We are accustomed to hear the boasts of the American shores as the Ultima Thule in a western direction, but when we reach those shores we find that the Ultima Thule is still west. The daily papers are filled with accounts of persons migrating west, and thither am I going. I shall be in all before me where I choose "the theatre a new life—my life of we—and I would have it far from the blue sea, out of hearing of the roar of the waves that have my school home. I will go where the wide prairies sweep and, on every side to the horizon—where the people look with their heads with the servant, and American noble and Hi-ness above contemnate my nativeness. "You will be society at the West," has been said to me. This is another attraction to that region. I would seek out my destiny in solitude. I desire to travel without company, and be a stranger in the backwoods settlement. I have purchased three commodious horses for a little more than one hundred pounds, and have engaged a servant, a young man, half-Indian, half-Spanish, to attend me, compensation, at about two pounds per month. A very light carriage, made and offered by my brother, will sometimes be my bed, will transport the moderate wardrobe which I shall retain if necessary, to take with me in the emigrant wagon of tools, utensils and good books, while leaving carriage and wardrobe, or at least all of the last which may be of no better by a few more, I shall proceed to that forest into the old forests of this new world. I long to be alone with "Nature's full, free heart," particularly, there my soul may learn as yet, you. Farewell, dear Edward. You may hear of me next among the Sacs and the Pottawattamies, address H. Danforth, care of Messrs. Bowen, merchants, ——— street, Boston.

H. DANFORTH.

A new external life had indeed opened upon the child of luxury and conventional refinement, to whom environments had been chronicled as matter of interest in the public, for whose pleasure the "world" had postponed its fetes, might now travel hundreds of miles without observation or inquiry. He upon whose steps had waited a crowd of obsequious attendants, now found himself with one fellow-traveller whose tone of independence occasionally seemed to call him servant. In cities, where he would still have been surrounded by those conventional distinctions of which he had himself been deprived, the sense of a great loss would have been ever present with him, as the contrast with the past would have made the fairest present to which he could now attain, desolate. But there could be no comparison, nor therefore no painful contrast, between the wild life of the prairies and the ultra civilization of English aristocratic society. In the excitement and adventure of the one, he hoped to forget the other. He sought to forget—not to be resigned, to acquiesce. His inner life was unchanged. He had been a dreamer—a pleasure-seeker—and a dreamer and pleasure seeker he remained, though the dreams and the pleasures must be wrought from new materials. To sketch the progress of such a character through the shifting scenes of his new existence—to observe him in his association with the strong, daring, acute, but uncultivated denizens of our frontier States—to stand with sympathizing heart beside him as he first entered upon those unpeopled solitudes in whose silence God speaks to the soul, is not permitted us at present. This may be the work of another day; but now we must pass at once with him from Boston to a scene within the confines of Iowa.—His carriage had been left behind, and for two days he had been riding over a rolling country, whose green knolls, dotted here and there with clumps of trees, brought occasionally to his mind the park scenery of his own land. Early in this day he had passed a farm with a comfortable house and substantial out-buildings, but no dwelling of man had since presented itself to him, though the sun was now low in the western sky. Under ordinary circumstances this would have been of little consequence, for he had already spent more than one night in the open air without discomfort; but his attendant had heard a distant muttering of thunder, and John Stacy was not the lad to encounter without summoning a night of storm unsheltered. Horace had observed the lowering sky and he was the first to perceive and announce the approach of a rider. We use the neutral term rider not without consideration, for he was one in whom a certain ease of manner and even an air of commanding independence in the testimony of habit, mingled with and worn after a fashion recognized nowhere as characteristic of the genus gentleman. A courteous inquiry from Horace Danforth respecting the nearest place at which a night's shelter might be obtained, was met by a cordial invitation to him to return with him to his own house. It was an invitation not to be disregarded under existing circumstances, and it was accepted with evident pleasure both by master and man.

Mr. Grahame, for to that name Horace had announced himself, led the way back for a short distance over the route just pursued by our travellers, and then striking off to the left, rode swiftly forward for several miles. The light grey clouds which had gathered in the morning sky had deepened into blackness as they proceeded, and flashes of lightning were darting across their path, and large drops of rain were falling upon them when they neared a house constructed of logs, yet bearing some evidence of taste in the decorations of it, as well as in its position, which was on the side of a gently sloping hill, and looking upon a landscape through which seem a clear and rapid, though narrow stream.

"Like good travellers, we will use our house as the end, not the beginning, of our journey," the main building to one of the out houses, built also of logs, which served as a stable. Here Horace Danforth relinquished his tired steed to the care of John Stacy, and Mr. Grahame having himself ushered down his own beautiful steed, and thrown a bundle of hay before him, with a slight apology to his visitor for the detention, led the way into the house. As they entered the vacant parlor a bade of something like consideration passed over the features of Mr. Grahame, and having seen his guest seated by a huge fire place, whose cheerful blaze of wood a chilly evening made by no means unwelcome, he left him alone. He soon returned, however, with a brighter expression, which was explained when he said, "I feared on my return to find this room empty, that my daughter had been sent for to a sick woman with whom she was lately spent several days and nights, and that I could offer you only the discomfort of a bachelor's establishment, but I find she is at home, and she will soon be supper."

During the absence of his host, our Englishman had looked around with increasing surprise at the contents of the parlor. The furniture was of the most simple description, yet mingled by a certain taste with articles of a very different character, as he could not but feel, think, of a cultivated taste. The same mingling of even rude simplicity of material and tasteful arrangement prevailed in the chamber to which his host now conducted him, and where he found all that he had been wonted to regard as the comfort, of abundance of clear water and clean napkins awaited him. In a very few minutes after his return to the parlor a door was opened through which he obtained a view of an inner apartment, well lighted, and containing a table so spread as to present no slight temptation to a traveller who had not broken his fast since the morning meal. At the head of this table stood a young woman, of graceful form, whom his host introduced to him as his daughter, Miss Grahame.

Mary Grahame's clear complexion, glowing with the hue of health, her large and soft and dark eyes, her abundant glossy black hair, might have won from the most fastidious some of that admiration given to personal beauty; but in truth Horace Danforth had grown indifferent, as well as fastidious, and it was not till in after days he had seen the complexion glow, and the dark eyes kindle with feeling, that he said to himself, "She is beautiful." To the fascination of a peculiarly graceful, gentle, yet earnest manner he was, however, more quickly susceptible. During this first evening, the chief emotion excited in his mind was surprise at the style of conversation and manner, the acquaintance with books, and with the finer graces which marked these inhabitants of a log cabin in the western wilds—these denizens of a boundless forest.

A day of hard riding had induced such fatigue that even the rare and unexpected pleasure of communication with refined and cultivated minds could not keep Horace Danforth long from his pillow. He was on a bed of down which he felt tenderly but effectually awakened. I am now his—a begun life in reality.

be passed. Could he believe his eyes? Was that comfort and prettiest of all homesteads, who, nothing with a home to support, he must labor hard, of already he is sunning at something more than the supply of merely physical wants; and I doubt not he will, if he lives long enough, become the intelligent and wealthy father of a well-educated family."

They were approaching the house as Mr. Grahame spoke. Near it was a small potato patch, in which a man was hoeing.

"How is your wife, Martin?" asked Mr. Grahame.

"Oh, thank you, sir, she is quite smart. She's been getting better ever since the night Miss Mary set up with her last. We say she always brings good luck."

"And how are your potatoes?"

"How could they help but be good, sir, with such grand seed as you gave me? Tell Miss Mary, if you please, sir, that the rose tree is growing finely, and that as soon as I can get time to put up the fence, Sally is to have the flower garden she talked about."

"I am glad to hear it, Martin; if you are brisk you may have some flowers yet before frost. I will bring you some seeds when I come next."

"Do you procure your seeds from the East, or is it the result of your superior cultivation, that you are able thus to supply your neighbors?" asked Horace Danforth of Mr. Grahame, as they rode on.

"The potatoes were from my own field, raised from the seed two years ago. The grass and flower seeds were from my agent at the East. These little favors win for my daughter and myself considerable influence over our neighbors, and thus facilitate our attainment of the object for which we have pitched our tent in the wilderness, and accepted those labors which you justly regard as distasteful in themselves."

The return home of Mr. Grahame and his visitor, their dinner and afternoon engagements, offer nothing worthy of our notice. It was not till the labors of the day had been concluded, and the little party were gathered again before a cheerful fire in the parlor, that the subject of the morning's conversation was resumed. It was equally early in the supper-room, bringing with her a little basket of needle-work, Horace Danforth asked if he might not now hope to receive the promised sketch.

"I will give it to you with pleasure when I have had my evening song from Mary," said Mr. Grahame.

Opening the piano for his young hostess, Horace Danforth stood beside her as she sang, but he forgot to turn the leaves of the music before her as he listened, not only to a full and cultivated voice, accompanied by a fine instrument, touched by a skilful hand. As the sweet and well-remembered strains fell on his ear, he closed his eyes and gave the reins to fancy. Too loved and lost echoed around him, and he was with a stranger, a stream like feeling that, as the sweet sounds ceased, and Mary arose from the piano, he opened his eyes and looked around upon the rough walls and simple furniture of his present abode.

"It is now nearly three years," began Mr. Grahame, when his daughter and guest had resumed their seats near him, "since, crushed in spirit, I turned from the grave in which I had laid my chief earthly blessing, to wander 'anywhere, anywhere out of this world' which had but a few weeks before been, which still I knew it was to me, but which I was now ready to pronounce a desolate waste. The desire to avoid society made me turn westward, and nearly one hundred miles east of our present residence I found myself in the midst of a people whose characteristics, without schools, rude in appearance and in manners. Absorbed in the destruction of my own selfish happiness, I might have passed from among them without knowing that disease was adding its pangs to those inflicted by death, ignorance and poverty combined, but that a desire of her presence. The gentleman were soon summoned to breakfast.

It may have been that his early rising had given to Horace Danforth an unusual appetite; but certain is that he did ample justice to the meal at which Mary poured the coffee, and spread the tempting viands before him half so inviting as this.—And yet, in truth, it was simple enough. Toast crisp and brown, warm, light biscuits, fresh eggs, good butter, excellent coffee, and rich cream, were all it offered. Mr. Grahame presided, and spread no little herself, listened to her father and Horace, while they discussed the different characteristics of English or European and American society, with a pleased and intelligent countenance. Some observation from him drew from Mr. Grahame the following reply:

"There is one feature of American society upon which I think no foreigner has remarked, or if he has, it has been so carelessly as plainly to show that he was far from appreciating its importance, I mean the fact that here the thinker is likewise the worker. In England and the European states, the working class is distinct from the consumers, and there must be almost as great a contrast in the intellectual as in the physical condition of the two. All the refinement, the cultivation, must remain with those who have leisure and fortune—as a class, I mean, for individuals will of course be found, who, in spite of all disadvantages, will rise to the highest position. But here, in America, there are no idlers. Here, with few, if any exceptions, all must be, in some way, workers, and all must be thinkers. We attain thus to a republic of mind."

"Do you not fear that the result of this will be to check the development of individual greatness? that as you have no king in the state, so you will have no king in literature?"

"Even were this so, it would remain a question, where the great increase of general intelligence would not more than compensate the evil."

"Can many Pollocks repay us for one Milton—many Dryden for one Shakspeare?"

"You take extreme cases; besides, I only admitted your supposition to show that I could produce a set-off in the disadvantage. I do not believe that the necessity for labor at some sort will prevent a truly great mind from achieving for itself the highest station. I think the being of such minds proves that it will rather serve as a stimulus to their powers."

Horace Danforth was silent, and after a moment's pause, Mr. Grahame resumed.

"In the states of the morning and the thinking classes to-day, the refinements of life, those things which adorn and beautify it, take their true place as consoliers and soothers of the care worn and indurated mind. No Italian opera can give such delight to the relief of more or pleasure as the time in which I am listening to the evening song with which some loved one, in his home, sings him to repose."

"You speak con amore," said Horace Danforth, smiling at his host's fervor.

"I am. Had I been excluded from the enjoyments of refined life, I should long since have resisted and grown weary of my toil here. I felt the when compelled to relinquish my cottage for so only but two years, lest she might have the advantage of instruction in those branches of a comfortable education which I could give her at home."

"And having spent two years in the more cultivated East, did Miss Grahame return willingly to our home in the wilderness?"

This question was answered by Mary Grahame herself, and she answered simply, "My father was my home."

"You acknowledge, then, that could your father have been with you, you would have preferred remaining in the East?"

"He is one who has regard to a higher reward than any earthly one. He is a self denying Christian minister, who I induced to settle in my neighborhood. He preaches on the Sabbath, in a little church about two miles from my home, to a congregation of about twenty adults, and twice that number of children; and during the week he keeps a school which is well attended in the summer. Some of his earlier pupils are already shooting ahead of their teacher, and during the week he spends

Life in New York.

THE NEEDLEWOMAN.

FROM THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.

The Tribune has already contained a series of editorial articles on the subject of female labor, which gave many curious and surprising facts. Our object at present is to review things in the general, for the purpose of giving the reader a comprehensive view of the various classes into which Society in the metropolis is divided. It will be sufficient, therefore, for our purpose to present in a few words the average prices paid for various kinds of needlework, at the principal and prosperous establishments.

Common cotton shirts, and flannel under-shirts, six cents each. A good seamstress can run up two of these shirts per day; and even a very swift hand, by working from exercise to midnight, can make three—being 18 cents per week for the common women, and 36 cts. for the swifter; of course allowing nothing for holidays, sickness, accidents, losing out of work, &c. Good cotton shirts, with linen bosoms, neatly stitched, are made for twenty-five cents apiece. A good seamstress will make six in a day, thus earning $1.50 per week, by constant labor. Fine linen shirts with plaited bosoms, which cannot be made by the very best hands short of 48cm to eighteen hours steady work, are paid fifty cents each. An ordinary hand can make a garment of this kind in two days. Twenty-two cents, drawers, under-shirts, &c., &c., pay a shilling apiece to the seamstress, who can make one and perhaps two a day. Cloth pantaloons, vests, &c., pay eighteen to fifty cents—very seldom the latter price—and a woman makes on the average, about one a day. Thus, not to prolong these details, it may be stated, in a word, that the seamstress who is fortunate enough to get steady work, earns from seventy-five cents to two dollars a week. Besides these, it is necessary to state that the dressmakers, or at any rate the great majority of them, get absolutely nothing for their work. The way it is managed is this: The proprietors of the large dress-making establishments receive a great number of apprentices, who remain six months for nothing, boarding themselves in the mean time, for the privilege of learning the trade. They can already sew swiftly and well, or they are not accepted. To them are given out the dresses, and they are kept constantly at work sewing (not learning anything new) until the very day before their apprenticeship expires. Then a few hours are spent in giving them some general directions about cutting a dress, and they are discharged—their being no room for journeywomen or wages in an establishment where all work is done by apprentices for nothing. As fast as their "apprentices" is completed, they are replaced by other apprentices—and so it goes on—the desolate proprietress of the establishment growing rich and aristocratic, and the poor girls turning out upon the world to die of starvation and despair, or sell themselves to infamy.

Here then are the facts respecting a large and increasing class of our female population; and a sad enough picture they present. It is this picture which gave rise a few days ago to the following eloquent outburst of feeling from a lady of our acquaintance of whom I was soliciting information: "Is it not the strangest thing that can well be conceived, that Women, who by the present constitution of Society is made politically and socially a slave—who has no voice in, better than Serfs have in which she submits, in making the laws she is forced to obey—who is in short not recognized by any human institution of these days as an independent individual, or as anything apart from the necessity Man has for using or abusing her—that she is yet, like other sheep, whose existence is merged in their masters, even secured food, clothing and shelter for the fleeting 'gleam between two eternities' on which glides by her pale and suffering apparition! The workwoman has indeed no rights of her own. She can be oppressed, cheated, compelled upon, until the joyous life within her becomes a dead and poisonous impulse that drives her through the world eager for the grave, or stings her into desperation and revenge. But have revenge her strong? She has no redress, neither is those laws she did not sanction nor in that public opinion she cannot influence, and which regards her not. Seeing this, her gentle and tender nature at length undergoes a change. Then the feeble become the terrible, the weak and suffering Woman is transformed into an avenging demon. And who may wonder at her?"

In this great republican metropolis—this frogpond result of the highest and best thing that civilization can do, with all our boasted "Free" institutions in full bloom and life—there are thirty thousand virtuous women who have to live, die and be buried on what they can earn with their hands. In the ranks of this class of our population we find Woman in almost every aspect of misery, ever struggling and faint with the burden of life. Wives and daughters of broken-down merchants and speculating politicians form a large item in this catalogue. Reduced from affluence to poverty and hence want, they are all nalmost in the great account of poverty, patiently to the inevitable, and maintain day by day a fierce, unequal, but not doubtful contest with "cruel Fortune," until they sink beneath temptation or despair—to the brothel or the grave! A majority are borne up by pride alone from beggary, and the few who still cling to them among their acquaintance do not suspect to what strait they have been driven, until the crisis arrives and is over.

Next come the widows of tradesmen and mechanics, the wives and daughters of those who cannot get employment, and the wives of sick and intemperate husbands, and the children of invalid or drunken parents. Here are to be found some of the most patient and long-suffering, starving, toiling, heart broken, yet courageous women that ever glorified their Creator. Here, in miserable garrets, utterly deprived of human hope and sympathy, and often hunged and faint from the mere want of food, these creatures show what angels women are. Here, in cellars—cellars!—the abodes of pain and suffering, or the brutal appetite of hunger and intemperance makes the sick father or the drunken mother, command the pale and tender daughter to go out into the streets and sell herself for gold! Must it not be a life-resent-ling hell itself that begets such crimes as this? And how dare we wonder and shrug our shoulders with a pious sneer at those among these unfortunates who do not resist?

Then, too, from out their workshop windows, through the chinks and crannies of their miserable lodgings, our poor sewers see how gaily the busy and seeming-joyous world goes on—how every one appears to have hope in his eye and elasticity in his step. Nor can they fail to mark among the passing throng many women not more beautiful than themselves—whom perhaps they have well known as fellow workers—who go flaunting idly along in gay and costly robes, receiving the stealthy smiles and admiration of the lords of creation, who follow skulking after till they turn down some dark corner and with the coolness of a smile and a seductive word secure their victim. They want for nothing—they live in luxury—their white hands look fair and delicate from want of employment—their eyes seem to sparkle with joy, and their forms are rounded and elastic with generous fare and absence of toil. Is it surprising that our poor workers, looking out from their rags and squalid poverty and starvation upon all this, should forget (what perhaps they have never been informed of) the horror, the agony, the despair, the disease, the madness, which are the inevitable future of the courtesans? and the too many of them should, alas! desire to be like her?

But we are touching upon somewhat broader ground than we had intended to occupy in these pretending sketches, and find ourselves in contact with that great and terrible question, the cause of Prostitution—a question which some hope had the courage to unravel. Our object is simply to present a correct view of a large and unfortunate class of females, surrounded with all the trials and temptations which beset them—leaving the reader to draw his own conclusions. Having done this, with what little power of pen-drawing we possess, we will take advantage of the occasion to solemnly warn young women in the country against indulging for an instant the fatal desire—coming to the city to seek their fortunes by labor. If they could, as we have done, attend day after day the bar of the Police Court, or read the secret docket of the innumerable cases of heart-breakings, desolation and crime that there appear—or hear from their own lips the history of the wretched creatures who people the innumerable dens of infamy that abound in the metropolis—they would learn this one frightful truth. That more than half the prostitutes and female criminals in the city, come here from the country to earn a living in some honest way, and to gratify an innocent longing for a little female finery and a passion to "see the world." The end story is ever, erse the same—first destitution, then absolute want succeeded, then turned out of doors homeless and houseless, to be offered the dreadful alternative of prostitution. Young women!—if you are indeed a real Woman and no insane dreamer assuming an gentle form of purity, the better to carry on hell's work on earth—mark well our warning! Stay calmly where you are, beneath your own pure skies and amid the virtuous freshness of your home, no matter how humble it may be. Work—aye—dig—till the soil—do anything virtuous that will earn you bread—and more friend is not so easily alienate to get in the country! But as you value your moral purity and the welfare of your immortal soul, come not into the city, to lose yourself in the boiling, seething cauldron of licentiousness that rages forever here. If you have an intellect too active to be satisfied with the dull course of a country life, read and improve your mind by study, and nurture your heart by contemplation. If you have aspirations for the beautiful—surround yourself with flowers and touch birds and gentle creatures to be your playmates and companions; endeavor yourself to all the little children in the neighborhood—become the guard and noble ambition. Be only one worthy of Woman's need, of endearing yourself necessary to your fellow creatures, with as the natural result of your efforts, and of adding something to the beauty of this beautiful earth, of which God has made you the brightest and most precious blessing. Then may you, pure and humble though you be, fill your life with a gentle joy that shall bring health and happiness to cheek and eyes and surround your innocent pillow with beautiful dreams.

A LOVE LETTER.

The following letter was found on the person of a slave, who had secreted himself on the steamship Columbus on her last trip from Charleston. The Columbus put into Wilmington, N. C., and the slave was sent back to his master. A variety of papers were found upon his person, and among them this letter, "in his own handwriting." If original, it constitutes a docket for composition, that would not disgrace nine-tenths of our Sonnets.

Dear Lady—The language of a devoted heart, new beating with hope, now trembling with anxiety, is offered to you, it yours. Reject it, then if it is yours. I do not write to tell you that I can love you; that I wish to love you; that I ask the privilege to love you. I write simply to tell you that I do love you, and that with a passion so ardent, a feeling so profound, that, in spite of all the obstacles that it presents, I have been compelled to venture this declaration. To say that you are beautiful, graceful and accomplished—that you are lovely—that you are admirable in all that makes Woman desired, is but to echo or embody the thoughts of all around you. All acknowledge your attractions, but I feel them; and I cannot be so false to my own heart, as to conceal its emotions from the object to which they tend.

Lady, my position is humble; but not so are my feelings, my aspirations, or my capacities for enjoyment. I have not the pride of station; yet I am seeking what the wealth of the nobleman could not purchase—what neither gold nor station can give—a true heart, the bright ray of my destiny. Let it be the God of my ambition, and you shall see how much my love can do for one who, if you give to me, the favor that can give unbounded happiness to me.

A LEGEND.

We find in a late sermon of Theodore Parker, the following story. The subject of the discourse is "equal."

"They tell a story that one day Rabbi Judah and his brethren, the seven pillars of wisdom, sat in the Court of the Temple, on a feast day, discoursing about rent. One said that it was to have attained sufficient wealth, yet without sin. The second, that it was fame and praise of all men. The third, that it was the possession of power to rule the state. The fourth, that it consisted only in a happy home. The fifth, that it must only be in the age of one who is rich; powerful, famous, surrounded by children and children's children. The sixth said that all were vain unless a man keep all the ritual law of Moses. And Rabbi Judah, the venerable, the tallest of the brethren, said,—'To have spoken wisely, but one thing more discussion of this question, will gin explode! All these things addeth this,—that he keepeth the traditions of the elders.'

"There sat in the Court a fair-haired boy, playing with lilies in his lap, and hearing the talk, dropped them in astonishment from his hands, and looked up—that boy of twelve—and said,—'Nay, nay, my fathers, he only loveth rent, who loves his brother as himself, and God with his whole heart and soul. He is greater than fame, and wealth, and power, happier than a happy home, wiser than the wisdom of the ancients. Doing the fighting he received balls in four different places, and was otherwise wounded.

ALPHABETICAL CONUNDRUM.—Why is the letter A like the meridian? Because it's the middle of day. Why is the letter B like a hot fire? Because it makes oil boil. Why is the letter D like a fallen angel? Because, by its association with evil, it becomes, a devil. Why is the letter Eslike the end of time? Because it is the beginning of eternity. Why is the letter F like death? Because it makes all fall. Why is the letter G like a gallon? Because it is the beginning of greatness and goodness. Why is the letter H like the tooth of Adams? "This is the end of earth." Why is the letter I like the American Revolution? Because it is the beginning of Independence. Why is the letter J like the end of Spring? Because it is the beginning of June. Why is the letter K like a pug's tail? Because it is the latter end of work. Why is the letter L like a young lady giving away her sweetheart to another? Because it makes over a lover.

TRUE ACCOMMODATION.—It is said that political leaders are always partial to friendship and patronage. The following story, told in crossing good faith by a gentleman a day or two since, if true, would indicate the going the entire swine in the spirit of favoritism. The statement was, that a party of eight age a watchman, in one of the districts of the County, while going along a little heavy, fell over a fire-plug, and did himself some trifling damage.

He represented the matter as one of great individual grievance to the authorities of the district, and, without a moment's hesitation, the fire-plug was ordered to be removed by them. The story smacks a good deal of a Rockback, and as the relator was a political opponent of the party in power, it is account must be taken with many grains of allowance. If true, it only proves "that some things can be done as well as others."—Ledger.

THE TAYLOR FRIENDS.—Men has three friends in this world—how do they conduct themselves in the hour of death, when God summons him before His tribunal? Money, has best friend, leaves him first, and goes not with him. His relations and his friends accompany him to the threshold of the grave, and then return to their homes. The third, which he often forgets during his life, are his good works. They alone accompany him to the throne of the Judge—they go before—speak, and obtain mercy and pardon for him.

A SERIOUS COURTSHIP.—A love-sick swain, desirous to indicate the extent and character of his love for the empress of his heart, cried out: "Ah, Miss Brown, Miss Brown, my affection for you is so strong or—or—as the butter they gave me for dinner!" She was satisfied, as she boarded at the same house. The bargain was struck, and yesterday they were married.

MEANING OF DISTINGUISHED INNS FROM SIGNS.—Drop a little weak aquafortis on the metal; let it remain for a few minutes, and then wash it off with water. If it is stout, the spot will be black; but if iron, the spot will be whitish gray.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1848.

REMOVAL.

Our subscribers will please take notice that we have removed the office of the Post, from No. 98 Chestnut Street, to No. 66 South Third Street, first house below the Girard Bank. Our office is in the second story, above that of the North American.

TO POSTMASTERS.

We trust our old friends, the Postmasters, will exert themselves and get up large clubs for the mammoth Post; or if they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offer themselves, that they will show our Prospectus to some other influential and respectable person who will be willing to do so. We think there need be no great difficulty in getting subscribers to the enlarged paper, as those who will take the trouble to compare it with the other weekly papers, cannot fail to perceive that it outshines all competition. Let it be recommended to your friends, that they can get the same as the best, the bright ray of my destiny. Let it be the God of my ambition, and you shall see how much my love can do for one who, if you give to, the favor that can give unbounded happiness to me.

NOTICE.

Subscribers wishing their paper changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it changed unto in future.

All persons addressing letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State as well as of the town in which they live.

Post Masters or others sending for a club, would confer a favor by having them sent to one address when they can do so conveniently. ib

EMPLOYERS AND OPERATIVES.

The Pittsburg Factories, it appears, are now all under way again, with one exception. There was a compromise between the employers and the operatives. The Ten Hours system is to be adopted, with a reduction of 12 per cent. in the wages. Why could not this compromise have been hit upon at first, without a disturbance?

Our own opinion upon the matter is this. The operatives are right in the Ten Hours movement—two hours a day is long enough for men and girls to work. And the employers are right also. They have to compete with the manufacturers of other states and of foreign countries, and it is just that the Legislature should remember this when enacting alterations of the laws. But still it would not do to hold on to our best laws forever, because other states had laws of a similar bad character,—some one must begin, and the beginning should be made; but, because it is a beginning, the change should not be too violent and sweeping. Employers and employed should move jointly in such matters. The employed, for the sake of reform; the employers, for the same reason, and also to guard that great immediate evil be not done by forcing certain kinds of business out of the state. The interest of both parties, though antagonistical to a certain degree, are identical to a far greater extent. They may be antagonistical so far as a division of the profits is concerned, but they are identical when the question arises whether there shall be any business profits at all. It would therefore be well for each party to try and understand, more correctly than at present, the position of the other. Let employers learn to look at those under them as men, and not as mere doers of certain jobs, in odd times. Let operatives learn to regard their employers as men who have rights and interests as well as themselves, and not take advantage of every opportunity that opens, to embarrass and force them into certain terms by a simultaneous strike for higher wages. If there was more of a disposition in both classes to deal one with the other in the spirit of persuasion and forbearance, rather than in that of force, it would be better for both.

IRELAND.

The last hope of the friends of the late movement in Ireland, has now melted "into thin air." Meagher, the young and eloquent, the Patrick Henry of the cause, has allowed himself to be arrested, indignantly refusing to surrender himself, or to angle for bail, as that might be construed into an act of submission. With his imprisonment ends the last act in this drama of Irish rebellion. We might call it a farce—but respect for the brave and unfortunate men engaged in it, restrains our pen.

The friends of Ireland have now nothing else to do, than to fall back upon Conciliation Hall, and try again the slow but perhaps sure lever of moral power. For anything else, it is probable, the Irish people are not ready. We do not blame them. It is no slight matter to peril all that makes life dear, domestic happiness, and the calm of every day existence,—to exchange these for the uncertain fate and the stormy life of an insurrectionist. It is a sublime matter for us, sitting in our easy chairs, to talk lightly of the perils of a rebellion—with them it is a matter affecting houses, daily bread, wives, children, freedom and life. We therefore have no words of censure for the great mass of the Irish people. They were the best judges of the probability of success, and whether the old pain was preferable to the new peril. The consequences of that choice is upon their heads and their children's.

AMERICAN DELEGATES.

Two German Jews recently imposed themselves upon the students and liberal citizens of Vienna, as delegates from the citizens of New York, bringing assurances of American sympathy in the movement of the Austrian people against the despotism of labor. Were it an artisan, it was good and thousand florins, which latter, they averred, they had brought along with them. A great parade was being made of the deputies, a guard of honor being stationed at their door, &c., when the president caught the ear of the American Ambassador, who immediately exposed the impostors in the papers. But the good Viennese had no idea of giving up their prize; and could not be satisfied that they had been duped, until they applied to an American traveller, who happened to be staying at a hotel in that city. He suggested what they had never thought of—that they should make application for the eight thousand florins. But by this time the birds had flown, and the two American delegates, with their proffers of one hundred thousand men and eight thousand florins, were nowhere to be found.

PEACHES.

Peaches have been cheaper and more plentiful this summer, in this part of the world, than we have ever before known them. They have been sold at six cents a dozen, occasionally. A friend who recently visited Maryland, informs us that he saw an orchard of most splendid peaches, into which the owner had turned his hogs—as it would not pay expenses to send the fruit to market. We have also heard of this being done in other cases. Such hogs, we think, ought to make good pork.

The older portion of our inhabitants are said to be considerably mortified by this amazing plentifulness of peaches—inasmuch as they find it impossible to say that they ever knew of a larger crop, in old times. Of the immense size and quality of the peaches were vastly superior seventy years ago, when our "oldest inhabitants" were young.

A POOR TRICK.

It is getting rather too common, now a days, for the managers of political meetings to announce the expected presence of various distinguished gentlemen, without any sufficient warrant of their intention to be present. It generally turns out that not more than one, and perhaps none, of some half dozen announced, are present at the meeting. This is a small business, gentlemen politicians, and does no good to the party that you represent. In politics as well as in some other things, a scrupulous regard is truth is the best policy.

A BULL.

Some of the wits are amusing themselves with the thought, that the first Irish insurrection should have resulted in a practical bull—being, in fact, no insurrection at all. They assert that the Irish would have been false to their national character, if it had been otherwise. It is suggested that if they will demonstrate their next attempt a "possible demonstration," the chances will be very great of its turning out a pretty serious one.

PARIS.

At the last dates, fears of another outbreak appeared to prevail in Paris. The cause was either the threatened prosecution of Ledru Rollin, Louis Blanc, and others, or else a feeling of dissatisfaction at things generally. The soldiery was said to be prepossessed for several days. It was considered probable, however, that in a short time all would gradually become calm again.

ROME.

The Pope and people of Rome are highly indignant at the entrance of the Austrian army into the Roman territory. The Chamber of Deputies has unanimously decided to appeal to France. The vote has been officially communicated to the French Ambassador, to be sent to Paris. This matter will doubtless be included in the mediation of England and France.

THE COTTON CROP.

A correspondent, who writes from Vernon, Madison County, Mississippi, says:

"Our cotton crop was very promising until about three weeks ago, when the rainy season set in and the hole worm commenced its ravages. It has already injured the crop fully one-third, and if the wet weather continues will injure it one-half."

SMITH O'BRIEN.

We give on our first page a portrait of this leader of the late Irish attempt at insurrection. The following is an account of himself and family:

"He was born at Dromeland, County of Clare, on the 17th of October, 1803, being the second son of Sir Edward O'Brien, fourth baronet (who died in 1837,) by the daughter and co-heiress of W. Smith, Esq., of Cahirmoyle, County of Limerick. The latter lady was a very rich heiress. The issue of this marriage, in addition to the subject of this sketch, consisted of eight other children, including Sir Lucius, the eldest son.

"The present head of the house of O'Brien, or Bryen, is the Marquis of Thomond, who adopts the latter form of orthography, and he deduces his descent from the royal line of Thomond, a series of princes which opening from the celebrated Brian, Irish monarch, Brian Boroihme, or Boru, who commenced his reign in 1002, terminated it with his life near Clontarf, in 1014. Should the present Marquis die without male issue, Sir Lucius O'Brien will succeed him as Baron Inchiquin; but not to the higher titles, which will become extinct. In reference to the existence of these titles, it may be added that in 1543, Murrough O'Brien, the then head of the house, repaired to England and resigned his sovereignty to Edward VI., and was in recompense created Earl of Thomond for life, and Baron Inchiquin. The second holder of the honors, Sir Edward O'Brien, was son of Right Hon. Lucius O'Brien, who died during the lifetime of his father, by Catherine, daughter of Thomas Keightley, Esq., of Hurtingbard, County of Meath, grand-daughter of the first Earl of Clanwilliam, and first cousin of Queens Mary and Anne.

"Mr. O'Brien married, about twelve years since, the daughter of Joseph Gubbett, Esq., of Limerick, by whom he has had either six or seven children. Mr. O'Brien is a graduate of Trinity College, Cambridge; when first returned for the family borough of Ennis, in 1830, Mr. O'Brien was a tory, and as such opposed Mr. O'Connell in the case of the memorable Clare election. He subsequently became a whig, then a radical, and in 1843 he first joined the repeal ranks. Since 1835, he has represented the County of Limerick. On the last occasion he succeeded in defeating Mr. Caleb Powell, the Old Ireland candidate, by 94 votes. Mr. O'Brien fought a duel with the late Mr. Thomas Steele, having exchanged two shots with that gentleman. Sir Lucius O'Brien, elder brother, is Lord Lieutenant of the County of Clare. The Dowager Lady O'Brien is still living, and possesses a property of about £5,000 per annum, to which her second son was always considered to be the heir, but in either respect than to heir in prospect, Mr. O'Brien never was wealthy. His son, who is Ireland, taken up his residence at the seat of his mother."

Doubtless if the above parties had not been "joined in Hymen's silken tie," one or both would have been seriously injured. This is the last instance we have heard of the advantages of matrimony.

THE TAYLOR PLATFORM.

Any who have been dubious as to the true character of the Taylor Platform, can now have their doubts satisfied by a personal inspection. A weekly paper, with this title, having been recently started at No. 204 Walnut st., in this city.

Our Correspondents

LETTER FROM GRACE GREENWOOD.

Rochester, N. Y., Aug. 10th, 1848.

GENTLEMEN:—I believe that my last letter was written from Brooklyn, Conn. We left that place soon after, for New York, via Hartford and New Haven. In New York we remained a few days—just long enough to see all our friends who were not out of town. We put up at "Judson's Hotel," a most admirably kept, neat and elegant house, which we would more unequivocally recommend than some larger and more pretending establishments. Our visit to the great city was very pleasant, taking into consideration the advanced season. I saw many old acquaintances on Broadway as we had anticipated, and there certainly was enough going on in the way of amusements pour passer le temps.

It was on a morning of surpassing beauty that we left the city to ascend the Hudson, for the first time. The sky was resplendent with brightness, and clear as the blue eye of one we love—the sunlight flooded the shore, and flashed over the waters—a soft breeze played about us, as we stood on the deck of our flying craft—it bore on sweet perfumes from the banks, where the gay trifler had been frolicking with and weaving fond flowers and conceptibles young leaves, till they quivered with irrepressible delight and trembled with a visible gladness.

As all we had heard and read, and seen in paintings, the magnificence and loveliness of the Hudson scenery broke upon us with a joyful surprise. We knew absolutely nothing of the wealth of beauty with which Nature had dowered that glorious stream. As our eyes dwelt on those scenes, now receiving a new impress of light and shadow, now in serene loveliness, and everywhere crowned with the glory of their Summer verdure, our spirits were intoxicated with a pure delight, and we revelled luxuriously in the sense of the beautiful.

An Irish gentleman, (West Tory,) we spent some days with, a relative, the Commandant of the U. S. Arsenal at that place. As you may suppose, all the military lions were faithfully shown up to us. Among other things, I was much interested in seeing a number of Revolutionary documents, taken from the British during the Revolution—and some French pieces.

Since being appointed to this station, Major Belcher has been constantly employed in building, and making improvements in the Arsenal grounds. The wooden buildings which were in use in the time of his predecessor, General Worth, have been removed, and elegant, massive stone structures erected in their stead. Although myself professing "peace principles," I confess this military station is still a interesting place to visit. I was shown through all the work-shops, even the immense smithery, with which I was by far the most impressed; I have always thought the blacksmith's employment peculiarly picturesque, a most ancient occupation, too, it is, and I think I should prefer thee to grapple with tool. I love to watch the sturdy smith, as he stands in the intense glow of the flaming forge, and bends the massive iron like an osier twig, and melts it like pliant wax, and then, with clang and shower of blows, and red sparks fall about him like a shower of stars. To me, there is much of true beauty in this display of physical strength and hardy energy, and I cannot look upon the marriage of Venus and Vulcan as such a mesalliance after all.

The railroad route from Troy to Utica lies through a fine country, in some places cultivated like a garden, and in others wild as nature itself. We stopped but a few hours at Utica, and took the night-train for Rochester. We found the cars crowded with delegates to the great Buffalo Convention. Our car was filled to over-flowing with Barn-burners, on fire with free-soil democracy and turbulent with patriotic enthusiasm. So, as you may suppose, it was no place for meditation, or a quiet retiracy into the inner life of the spirit, as a transcendentalist might my.

But I have always a ready sympathy with great political excitement. I love to see men thoroughly roused, vehemently in earnest—feeling their manhood in every nerve, and pressing resolutely forward to the free expression and hold vindication of principles and rights. I love to see a regular tornado of popular enthusiasm careering over the land. I love to see the people shaking, swaying tumultuously, like the ocean roused by a mid-night storm. I love to hear the deep, thunderous voice which speaks its irresistible might—to see it lift up every now and then with the blaze of passion, as it sweeps away the old land-marks and boldly dashes against the bulwarks of power, poetry and partizanship.

"Oh, night and storm and darkness, ye are wonderous strong!" Yet here much stronger, grander and more glorious is the shock of contending minds, the fierce struggle of truth with error, than the blind strife of the elements.

It is the nature of our political institutions to keep our people earnest, active and alive. Amongst them "feel their life in every limb," these freemen in every footstep, their rights in every heartthrob.

In this beautiful city I have now spent about a week, among the scenes and friends of my early girlhood. Rochester was for some years my well-tutored home; for it was that I spent my few school days—received my trifle of book knowledge for "much learning" has never yet made me "mad" or blue. It was here that woman's life first opened upon me—not as a romance, not as a fairy dream, not as a golden heritage of beauty and pleasure; but as a sphere of labor and care and suffering—an existence of many efforts and few successes, of eager and great aspirations and slow and partial realizations.

Ah, life has thus far been to me severely austere, profoundly cold, and dark days of remorseless pleasure and ideal visions are yet to come. But enough of this.

If you have ever visited Rochester, you will remember the beautiful Genesee Falls, in the midst of the city. Well, if you now go where they are, they are not there, the water at the same season all used to turn the immense mills in the neighborhood of the onte sublime cataract. I cannot reconcile myself to the change which the spirit of improvement and the wheel speculation have made. Is it not a pity that the price of flour is a matter of more moment than the preservation of the picturesque,—and that cataracts and cotton-factories cannot coexist? The "Lower Falls," however, remain more as they were, unspoiled by the progress of the age. The surrounding scenery is most romantic and beautiful, and happily within a pleasant ride from the city.

The change which I remark in Rochester, wrought during the five past years, is indeed wonderful, and speaks well for the wealth, enterprise and public spirit of its citizens. The place is constantly and rapidly improving, and bids fair to become one of the most important cities of the Union.

FREE SOIL MEETING.

New Brighton, Pa., Aug. 22nd.

As you will perceive, I did not finish my letter at Rochester. The constant calls upon my time while in that city, prevented my giving my present to it in writing. There were so many friends, and previous old friends to visit, that I was ever on the wing, or the qui vive of pleasurable enjoyment.

We left Rochester on a most dusty morning for the cars.

"It rained and rained, and was never weary."

At Buffalo we stopped at the "Mansion House," a hotel of which the least said the better—for the accommodations. At night, we took passage for Cleveland, on the "Baltimore," a fine steamboat, with a very gentlemanly captain. There was a stiff breeze blowing, and the lake was quite rough through the entire trip. For the first time in my life, I had "a realizing sense" of the horrors of sea-sickness. At Cleveland, we spent the night at the "New England House," a model hotel in every respect. In the morning we took stage for Warren, Ohio, and from thence the packet to our village.

At home, once more. Home—how my heart thrills with joy and swells with thankfulness as I write that dear, that precious word. We are having a glorious family gathering this summer. We are almost all here—father, mother, seven out of nine of their sons and daughters, two daughters-in-law, and five grand-children!

Is it not beautiful, such a reunion in health and happiness, after long separation, and at the gorgeous season of the year? How should our hearts glow with gratitude and devotion toward Him who has for so many years preserved our family circle unbroken by death or dissension—that benignant Power, the wing of whose protection has sheltered us, the sun of whose strength has supported us, the atmosphere of whose love has been round about us. May this continue—may we live together, and be good and grateful as in the past, still wait upon our future pathways;—and though upon those pathways may descend the frosts of time, and blight one after another, the flowers of earthly affections—though the night of sorrow darken it, yet may the Heaven above be over cloudless and serene to the eye of faith, ever silvery with starlight of divine consolations.

I will not apologize for the personal tone of this letter. I believe your readers are so sensible enough to feel sympathy in the joys and sorrows of others, and I will not doubt but they will enter partially at least, into my own present enjoyment. True happiness never renders one selfish, though it dwell upon it may seem egotistic. The more I feel of that nectar of the soul, the more earnestly I would turn and "put the cup to my neighbor's lip."

Adieu,

GRACE GREENWOOD.

Political Intelligence

GEN. TAYLOR'S OPINIONS.

As much curiosity prevails throughout the country as to Gen. Taylor's opinions upon various questions, we copy a portion of a letter recently published in the Mobile Herald, from a correspondent at East Pascagoula, where the General was visiting at the time. After giving a phrenological opinion of Gen. Taylor, and stating that he is not so large a man as we have been accustomed to believe—his legs being quite appropriate legs for his body, and not stumpy little pegs, stuck to a huge frame, as the pictures represent—the writer goes on as follows:—"Of course we do not hold ourselves responsible for the truth of his opinions.

The old man seems to be frank and without craft. He shuns no topic, and as far as I could discover, is accustomed to utter his opinions without reserve, even to his political editors. Last evening a group of some dozen or more of us was gathered round him, eagerly listening to an animated conversation, in which he was simply the city of manner was quite charming. He ran through various topics, which he illustrated with excellent anecdote. Speaking of the "Free Soil" movement in the North, he expressed fears that it would be the absorbing question in the next Congress, and engage all other questions. He said that he considered the "Missouri Compromise" a fair and liberal line for settling the slave question, and he was willing to see it adopted. He did not hesitate to pronounce slavery an evil, and blighting in its effects upon the agricultural and manufacturing prosperity of the South. To this he attributed the decay of Virginia; and he thought it would extend to other slave states, if not checked at some point. He spoke of it as a great evil, and he was as wise to think and talk of it, as any man in the country. He would not countenance it, except on consideration that they were willing to go to Africa. To the Northern States he would not send them, as he considered it would be a curse than that of bondage. He thought that if the really philanthropic men of the North, whose efforts to abolish the system are resting the privileges of the slave, could see its practical operation, the agitation would cease, and there would be less zeal and more wisdom in discussing the cause. As he expressed it, they would better observe the "eleventh commandment," which prescribes that every man shall attend to his own business.

In reply to a remark made by the person whom he was conversing with, that the great mass of the old party questions were obsolete. He daily received letters asking his opinion in relation to a United States Bank, and he was free to express his fear the Bank was dead, and it was as wise to think of restoring a dead man to life as to give it a new existence. He said he was pleased with statements which exhibited his unlimited confidence in the will and honesty of the people.

Gen. Taylor spoke emphatically of the spirit of conquest, and attributed the present political dissensions and discussions to a lust of conquest. On this subject he displayed much familiarity with both ancient and modern history, and frequently drew his illustrations from it. Greece, said he, lost her liberty and her glory by the spirit of conquest. He alluded to the reigns of James I., Louis XIV., Napoleon and Louis Philippe, and, as the conversation became more familiar, conversed, added zest to the discussion, and left a very favorable impression of the philosophy he had gathered from the history of the past.

POLITICAL ITEMS.

Moses B. Cavwin is the Whig candidate for Congress in the Champaign District of Ohio, and his friends are sanguine of his triumphant election. Whichever succeeds, it will be "all in the family."

Col. Field, Whig, was elected to the Legislature of Kentucky by one majority over Jesse Hayden, Democrat; but Col. F. has resigned, and will be unopposed for a seat in the Legislature in the county. Field, being elected by one vote, and finding that Hayden had voted for him, resigned, because he had failed to vote for Hayden.

Hon. John P. Hale has withdrawn his name from the list of Presidential aspirants; and enrollment commenced among the supporters of Van Buren and Adams.

At the election of 1844, the aggregate vote that was polled for Mr. Birney, the Anti-Slavery candidate, was 56,802.

The vote for President, in Pennsylvania, in 1844, was:

Polk,	167,535
Clay,	161,128
Birney,	3,1[illegible]

Senator John M. Niles, of Connecticut, Democrat, addressed a Van Buren meeting at New Haven, on Tuesday week.

Madame Dacusseau, formerly Fanny Wright, made a speech at a political meeting at Germantown, Tenn., a few days ago.

Benjamin F. Butler has been removed from his office of District Attorney in New York, and John McVean appointed in his place.

Gen. Turney, of Illinois, has declined the appointment of Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of Oregon.

Ex-Governor Thomas, of Maryland, has written a letter, in which he goes for Free Soil and the Free Soil candidates, Van Buren and Adams.

Daniel Webster delivered an address at Marshfield on the 1st instant, in which he took strong ground in favor of Gen. Taylor, and decided that the question of slavery had anything to do with his nomination. He was very serious upon the course pursued by the Free Soil party. Free Soil party.

Albemarle, in North Carolina, at the county election, gave 180 for Manly for Governor, and 1 for Reid.

The President, it is said, is coming North in a week or two, on a visit to New England.

LETTER FROM GEN. CASS.

A letter from General Cass appeared in the "True Democrat," of August 23, published at Ann Arbor, Michigan. We find it almost impossible to keep up with General Taylor; but as General Cass's letters are very scarce, we seize upon the present one with avidity. It was furnished to the "True Democrat," by Mr. Wilcox, to whom it was addressed.

WASHINGTON, February 19, 1848.

MY DEAR SIR—Your friend Doyle will be selected as a Lieutenant, and I am glad we can give you this proof of a desire to pay respect to your meritorious services.

I am pressed to death by business, or I would write you a longer letter. However, the newspapers give you a full account of our strange proceedings. We have not done much good; but I hope it is darkest just before daylight, and I am inclined to think that our worst days have past. It seems to me that good is coming of the mischief. There is a more determined spirit to support the Administration than I have seen heretofore.

It is now distinctly understood, and will be the Democratic sentiment through the country, that everything must give way to a vigorous prosecution of the war, and that no measures must be proposed that will embarrass the Administration.

The Wilmot Proviso will not pass the Senate. It would be death to the war—death to all hopes of getting an acre of territory—death to the Administration, and death to the Democratic party. It was not so intended. It no doubt originated with proper feelings; but things have now come to such a pass, that its adoption will produce these effects.

It is distinctly avowed by the Southern members of Congress that they would not vote for any measures for the prosecution of the war, nor would they ratify any treaty if this provision become a law. It will probably get back from the Senate to the House, where I hope the opposition will place it where it belongs.

I am, with great respect, truly yours,

LEWIS CASS.

R. E. Wilcox, Esq.

GERRIT SMITH.

Gerrit Smith, the Presidential candidate of the "vote yourself a free" men, and a portion of the Abolitionists, has written the following letter to the editor of the "Model Worker."

To the Editor of the Model Worker:—A fortnight ago, you wrote me, saying that I had written a letter to the Buffalo Convention, advising the nomination of Mr. Van Buren. They not only say, that I have written a letter addressed to Gritsmen my name from the Presidential canvass, but they go on to inform your readers that I am effectually helping out both Cass nominations and English things, of which the newspapers accuse me. I cheerfully let my action in this matter speak for itself. I do not shall deign to make any reply to the other questions. I shall let my conduct speak for itself. I shall let my conduct speak for itself. I shall let my conduct speak for itself

United States SATURDAY POST.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1848.

THE CHESTER COUNTY BANK ROBBERY.

There have been, recently, says the Daily News, some most singular developments made in relation to the Chester County Bank Robbery, and two or three additional arrests have been the consequence, while others, well known to the community, are implicated. We are not as yet at liberty to note the facts which have come to our knowledge; but it will be sufficient to know that there is now a probability that the perpetrators of the robbery will be secured. Robert E. Lackey alias Harper, who was arrested on suspicion of being concerned in the affair, has implicated several others, some of whom he fled; and the matter will now be probed to the bottom.

In addition to this, we learn from the North American, that "Edward M'Gowan was held to bail in $6,000, by E. M. Lee, Recorder, on Saturday, on a charge implicating him in the robbery of the Chester County Bank."

We learn further, that there is a great probability that a large portion of the money stolen—over $30,000—will be recovered. Lackey, it appears, has turned State's evidence; and we are informed that as soon as Dr. Darlington—President of the Chester County Bank, from whom the value, on taking the money was stolen—was confronted with Lackey, he instantly identified him as the person who took his seat by him in the car a few moments before the robbery was committed, and who disappeared with the value. The car agent, also, we learn, recognised him at once. Thus, by a curious chain of circumstances, has this singular robbery been at last ferreted out.—Germantown Telegraph.

TO FRUIT GROWERS.

☞ A Convention of Fruit Growers is to be held at Judson's Hotel, in New York, commencing on the 10th of October. The objects of the meeting are to compare fruits from various sources and localities, with a view of arriving at correct conclusions as to their merits, to settle doubtful points respecting them, and to assist in determining the synonymes by which the same fruit is known in different parts of the country, and generally to elicit and disseminate pomological information, and to maintain a cordial spirit of intercourse among horticulturists. Persons attending the Convention are requested to bring with them, carefully labelled, specimens of all fruits grown in their vicinity that may be worthy of notice, and if possible a small branch of leaves of each variety.

Agricultural and Horticultural Societies are invited to send delegates and transmit at an early day a list of their delegates to T. B. Wakeman, Secretary of the American Institute, New York.

CAUTION TO FARMERS.

A farmer named Hibbard, residing in the Leighborhood of Darby, met with his death recently in this city, in a truly melancholy manner. While at his hotel, he heard the struggling of a horse in the stable, and proceeded to see what was the cause of it. He found the horse choking with the halter around his neck, and in his efforts to relieve the animal, he was thrown down and trampled upon from head to feet, causing his death in twenty or thirty minutes afterwards. The horse belonged to another person. The deceased was sixty years of age.

MR. CALHOUN AND THE BIBLE.—Mr. Calhoun's recent assertion that man is neither born nor created, has induced a writer in one of the newspapers to justify the very common opinion that he is a hero, with the following taste of Scripture, which show that if Jefferson was wrong when he wrote the Declaration of Independence, he, at least, had respectable authority for his error. For example, the good book says.

"Let man be born unto trouble as the sparks fly upwards."—Job, v. 7.

"Though man be born like a wild ass' colt."—Job, xi. 12th.

"Man that is born of woman is full of days and full of trouble."—Job, xiv. 1.

"Art thou the first man that was born? Or wast thou made before the hills?" Job, xv. 7.

"Shall man be born unto the world."—Job, xx. 4.

"Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?"—Malachi, ii. 10.

"Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth."—Eccl. xii. 1.

BOARD OF HEALTH.—The number of deaths during the last week in this city was 169—adults 65, and children 105.

Items of News.

HIGHLY HONORABLE.—The New Orleans Bulletin records a fact which is indeed most worthy of record, and one which that paper received from a Mexican gentleman of great intelligence and liberality, that there does not exist in the whole of Mexico, at the time, a single unpaid debt contracted by any of the officers of our regular army. We doubt very much, if the same upright conduct has ever before marked the career of a victorious army in a campaign of over two years in an enemy's country.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.—Several years ago Mr. Ellet, the successful engineer of the Niagara Suspension Bridge, proposed to the citizens of St. Louis, to construct a similar bridge, across the Mississippi River, at that place. The possibility of achieving such an undertaking was then doubted, and the matter was dropped; but now that the Niagara Bridge has been completed, attention is seriously directed to Mr. Ellet's proposition by the people of St. Louis.

THE MURDERER OF MR. BUSHNOLDAY.—Letters, says the Cleveland Times, received from Sault St. Marie, state that disclosures have been recently made at Fort Brady, indicating that the assassination of the late J. L. Schoolcraft, near that Fort, on the 6th of July, 1845, was, directly or indirectly, the act of Robert Tilden, the officer who was subsequently convicted of robbery and murder in the city of Mexico, and sentenced to be hanged.

NEW WILL CASE.—A curious law question, it is said, will rise out of the events of June in Paris. A National Guard, before repairing to the barricades, had made his will, which he carried with him in his pocket. He was killed by a ball, which passed through the will, and carried away with it the figures affixed to many of the bequests made by the testator. The question which will have to be decided is, how are the gaps thus caused to be filled up?

FRAUD IN TEA.—Professor Reid, of the N. Y. College of Pharmacy, has recently discovered a new fraud that is practiced to a considerable extent by the dealers in tea. Some kind of leaves are taken, and, by the aid of coloring matter, manufactured into a substance resembling tea leaves. When this fictitious article is put into water and allowed to stand for some time, the coloring matter is found precipitated at the bottom of the vessel.

NEW INVENTION.—A lieutenant in the British Navy has invented a "peril indicator," to show when steamers or other ships are running into shoal water. The apparatus consists of two bars, which project ten feet below the keel of the vessel, and, as soon as these bars touch the ground, they spring up on a level with the keel, and ring a bell, which warns the engineer that he must reverse the engines, and drive the ship astern.

KILLED BY LIGHTNING.—During the thunder storm on Thursday week, we understand that Christopher Dunn, of Belgrade, was killed by lightning. He was walking in a room where a gun and bayonet were hanging horizontally against the wall, and at the moment when his shoulder was in the direction of the rod, the electric fluid passed from the point of the bayonet to his body, killing him.—Kennebec Journal.

RELIGIOUS RETROGRESS.—There arrived at New Haven, Conn., on Wednesday week, in the schr. Gold Hunter, from Porto Rico, twenty-three passengers, Portugese, who were forced to leave the island of Madeira, some two years since, in consequence of their religion being obnoxious to the laws at that country. It is stated they are of the Presbyterian denomination.—Boston Bee.

THE HABANERO.—Although it is as hot as fire, onya a late letter from Havana, the Habanero drew with cloth coats, thick cravats and socks. They beat the Africans in standing the heat. They attend the balls, theatres and concerts every night, and feel comfortable where a Cape Cod Yankee would be melted by the heat. Several theatres have been open the whole summer.

OUTRAGES ON THE MEXICANS.—Several outrages have been committed on the Mexicans, it is said, by a party at Tuscon, headed by men of some standing in society, and from whom better conduct was expected. Several towns are said to have been made to pay arbitrary and wholly unjustifiable contributions, and life has been mercilessly taken in enforcing such contributions.

BOUCHERIE.—The Trustees of Hampden Sidney College, Va., announce that the experiment of raising a permanent fund of $50,000 by means of subscriptions of $100 each, entitling the subscriber to educate his own sons, or else any other young man, with the privilege of appointing his successors for twenty years, has been entirely successful.

A HORSE RACE.—A public functionary in Paris who recently visited the hospitals, asked of the surgeon in attendance, "Doctor, how many insurgents have you here?" "I have only wounded men," was the answer.

THE SHIPS O'BRIEN CLUB, OF NEW YORK.—This Club, it is stated, has broken up. The Trustees returned the money collected to the donors, and then by a unanimous vote the Club dissolved its own dissolution.

THE POTATO DISEASE.—The following directions, derived from practical experience, are well deserving of attention: 1. Let all early potatoes that are ripe be immediately taken up. 2. Examine the stalks of all others every day. 3. Whenever you find any stalk diseased, put your foot one on each side of it and pull it up, leaving the potatoes in the ground—do not cut the stalk off, but pull it up by the roots. 4. Then tread down and harden the ground over the potatoes, and trench it up. 5. Burn the diseased stalks; do not, on any account, leave them on the ground. 6. All the late potatoes should remain in the ground and be dug up only as wanted, for when the disease has once made its appearance, exposure to the air is found to increase it.

PROMOTIONS.—The National Intelligencer contains an immense list of Army promotions for gallant meritorious services in Mexico. All the Brigadier Generals are made Major Generals by Brevet; Colonels Riley, Harney, Garland, Clarke, Morgan, Childs, Andrews, Trousdale, Churchill, Whiting, Belknap, Buckhead and Totten, are made Brigadier Generals by Brevet; and officers are very generally advanced one or more stages, according to the opportunities they had to distinguish themselves.

TALLY HO!—A great deer chase is to come off at Eureka Springs, Kentucky. One hundred horsemen and one hundred hounds were to unite in the chase, and as deer are exceedingly plentiful, there will be sure sport. Mine host of the Springs, who has got up this deer chase, has a bear fight every Thursday. We thus see the march of refinement in different sections of the Union. At Saratoga it is a grand fancy dress ball. In Kentucky it is a deer chase and a bear fight.

A gentleman of Cincinnati has given two thousand dollars to purchase territory outside of the present limits of Liberia. He proposes to give this territory to colored people from Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, to form a State of the Liberia confederacy. A wealthy citizen of Mississippi is said to have promised one hundred thousand dollars to establish a college in Liberia.

LATEST NEWS!

FROM MEXICO.

Vera Cruz dates have been received to the 17th ultimo:

News from the interior announces the gradual subsidence of the elements of disorder, which were called into such active operation during the late hostilities, into the wholesome regularity of peace and tranquillity. The public bodies are introducing ameliorations everywhere, under the industrious administration of Herrera. Lately a plan of prison discipline was submitted to the Chamber of Deputies, by the Minister of the Interior, in which a lively desire is expressed to imitate the Penitentiary system in our own country. It forms a very remarkable feature in the new order of things which now reigns in Mexico, evincing very plainly that there is some recuperative power, or wish for recuperative power, in the character of the people.

The Monitor Republicano announces that an official notice was lately published in the Gazette Gazette, giving an account of a triumph achieved over the Indian insurrectionists in Guaymas. The same periodical, in speaking of the late events in Chiapas, states that more is to be feared from the collision of parties in that State than in the war of castes.

Intelligence has reached the Capital of the final evacuation of the city of Chihuahua by the Americans. It took place on the 15th ult.

The Echo del Comercio of the 10th, reminds the people that on the day preceding, just one twelve-month ago, the American forces took up position in front of the city; when so much enthusiasm was exhibited by the National Guard and the citizens in general, to hasten to the defence. All was, however, useless, and the hopes of victory were buried in ruinous defeat. That period significantly remarks that the recollection should not fade from their minds; it deems it a duty to freshen their memory, as a useful lesson.

PARADO.—Information has reached the Government that Paredes has taken refuge among the Indians in Sierra Gorda. He is denounced by the Monitor as now trying to raise up a war of castes.

We find in the Aco Iris, of the 8th ultimo, an account of the proceedings of a meeting of American merchants, residing in that city, of which Mr. J. Morell was President, and Mr. W. D. Lee, Secretary, wherein resolutions were passed, expressive of their sense of the courtesy exhibited to them by the authorities, since the evacuation.—They declare that they will respect the law and authorities of the country, and be ready to aid the latter in suppressing any turbulency which might hereafter threaten public order. A copy of the resolutions was presented to the Prefect, who made a very friendly response, assuring the American merchants that they were safe in person and property, under the Mexican laws, and professing every desire to cultivate the most amicable relations with them and their countrymen.

The greatest desire is felt and expressed by the Mexican Government, and the prominent members of all parties, for the encouragement of immigration. The Governors of States are exhorted by the Executive to give every facility to foreigners coming into the country; the latter are to be treated with the rights and immunities of citizenship on assuming their intention to make the country the home of their adoption. The authorities of the different States are requested to communicate to the Government the names, occupations, &c., of strangers, immediately after their arrival.

THE CHOLERA.

A correspondent of the Ledger extracts from a recent German publication, the following remarks relative to the Cholera:

The Cholera appeared for the first time in India, in 1829. Thence, it advanced through the Gulf of Persia, between the Caspian and the Black Sea to Russia, and thence proceeded to a regular tour all across Europe, disappearing in the Gulf of Bothnia, eight years after its appearance in Hindostan. What course it will take this time, we know not, but it is a singular coincidence that it has reached Moscow, on precisely the same day as in 1830, and that the winter at first checked its progress, just as it did on that occasion. The Cholera is an endemic disease, that is, where it is found the whole year round, though rarely of a very malignant character. It was there, where, in 1845, at the time of the spring equinox, it suddenly spread with great rapidity, and assumed a most malignant feature. It is the fear of Russia, at which, on ordinary occasions, thousands of pilgrims are present, was wholly deserted. The dead and the sick covered the fields, and were surrounded by hawks and wild dogs. In the summer of 1845, the Cholera made its appearance in Afghanistan, in the counties of Sind and Aden, at the entrance of the Gulf of Persia, in Arabia, Iran, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria, Asia Minor, and in several places of central India, nay, even on the Island of Ceylon, in a much more southern latitude, of a malignant character prevailed throughout. Thus, in Cutrach, in the country of Sind, it destroyed one-half of the 25,000 inhabitants; in Bagdad, 7,000 people fell a sacrifice to that plague, and a caravan of pilgrims, from Bochara, Herat and Persia, to Mecca, was wholly destroyed.

After these terrible tidings no further news of the Cholera reached Europe; when in May, 1847, it suddenly appeared again at Tiflis, though in a much milder form, spreading over the whole of European Russia to Moscow. As in 1830 and 1845 it reached Europe at two points at the same time, viz: on the western frontier of the government of Orenburg and the western coast of the Caspian Sea, taking the direction of the river Wolga, and always following between the Caspian Sea and the West, but occasionally jumping sideways and even backwards.

The progress of the epidemic was very slow, but it followed, as on its first appearance, the course of rivers, and was most fatal on their margin in the bottom land. The rise of the Cholera in the East Indies were either entirely spared, or but little infested. The following governments of Russia have been visited by Cholera according to official accounts up to the 4th of February, 1848: Astrachan, Saratow, Jekaterinoslaw, Tauria, Charkow, Kiewyeh, Kursh, Penza, Country of the Cossacks on the Don, Pultawa, Orel, Tula, Simbirsk, Cassan, Nishnij Nowgorod, Country of the Tchernomatic Cossacks, Tambora, Resan, Grosnoy, Kiew Tchernigow, Moscow, Wetka, Chessan, Podolia, Wlaga, Twer, Minsk, Mohilow, Eastern Coast of the Black Sea, Smolensk, Wladimir, Wolonda, Sewolaw, Witebsk.

Since then it has reached Petersburg, and generally in the same time as heretofore, Berlin and Vienna. Comparing the Cholera with the Cholera Map drawn in 1831, by Schnurr, we find its march precisely the same as on its first appearance in Europe, but the character of the present disease is much more malignant than it was then, though the mortality was less, inasmuch as it spared it in less considerable. It preys particularly on the poorer classes, and selects on its second appearance those who have escaped from it by having the place of their residence and retaining thither too soon.

The mammatic and contagious character of the disease have both been proved; but being spread by atmospheric influences, the hope of checking its progress by quarantines, is entirely futile. The only means of checking its progress, or of its avoidance, consists in cleanliness and proper diet, especially in healthy food for the poorer classes.

The idea of discovering a specific remedy, homopathic, alopathic or hydropathic, is given up by all European physicians, and is entirely abandoned solely to the quacks. Neither the plague nor the yellow fever, nor any other contagious disease is rated by a specific, the disease assuming at all times and in almost every patient a specific character, according to his habit and temperament.

There can be little doubt but that the Cholera will reach the United States, though it will probably not before the next Summer, and its ravages will extend principally to the Southern and Southwestern States.

COMPLAINTS OF THE WORLD.

"All the complaints which are made of the world are unjust. I never knew a man of merit neglected. It was generally by his own fault that he failed of success. A man may hide his head in a hole to hide his face; he may shrink from the world now and then, which nobody cards, and then complain he is neglected. There is no reason why any person should exact himself for a man who has written a good book—he has not written it for any individual. I may as well make a present to the postman who brings me a letter. When patronage was limited, an author expected to find a Maecenas, and complained if he did not find one. Why should he complain? This Maecenas has others as good as he, or others who have got the start of him."

☞ Poor Beawell, probably to avert the torrent, suggested something about the bar, and asked for an allowance that there were men of merit there who never got practice. The Lord Chancellor made speech, pithy and severe. 'Sir,' said he, 'you are sure that practice at the bar is got from an opinion that the person employed deserves it best, so that if a man of merit at the bar does not get practice, it is from error, not from injustice. He is not neglected. A horse that is brought to market may not be bought, though he is a very good horse; but that is from ignorance, not from contention.'"—Biography of Dr. Johnson.

ARTIFICIAL BARRIERS TO SOCIAL INTERCOURSE.

We are so constituted that much agreeable and profitable social intercourse is prevented by a want of moral courage in adopting a simple style of entertaining one's friends and acquaintances. Let us look around, and what do we find to be the general state of intercourse between friends and acquaintances in the middle and upper classes of a commercial community? On the one hand, we see an entire abstinence from all social intercourse (except, perhaps, with immediate connexions), arising from economical motives, founded on the impossibility of complying with the supposed requirements of society in this matter. On the other, we find individuals giving, once or twice a year perhaps, an expensive and formal dinner party, or a stiff evening entertainment, at neither of which does any one feel himself at ease; where one is in the midst of a most heterogeneous company, gathered together without any earthly reference to fitness or congeniality, and from which one at last escapes, thankful to find himself again at his own quiet fireside—inwardly vowing that nothing shall extinguish the social spark or stifle its genial precincts for any such vain and profitless visiting. During the winter, Mr. and Mrs. A ——have been invited to dinner by Mr. and Mrs. B——, or the young people have had "the pleasure of their company requested," &c., by the C——s. The A ——s consequently feel it incumbent on them to clear off the debit supposed to be owing to the said B——s and C——s, by inviting them in return; and in order to have a genial blending of all or none, they betwixt themselves of all and sundry from whom they have received civilities during the past six or twelve months, and without any consideration whatever to the harmony of the ingredient members of the company, a great crowd of persons, for the most part utterly strangers to each other, are suddenly packed together, the house is turned topsy-turvy for a few days, a great deal of money is foolishly squandered, no comfort or satisfaction has resulted to anybody, and when the affair is over, the givers of the entertainment begin to feel a sort of uneasiness that a year at least must elapse before they have again to undergo similar trouble and expense. For months after this event, the A ——s would as soon think of flying as of asking any of the B——s, C——s, or D——s to drop in upon them in a quiet way to spend an evening. With such persons there is no medium between a formal tiresome party and an entire abstinence from all visiting whatever.

The fact is, the true secret of genial and improving social intercourse—of anything at all approaching even to the name—is but little understood, and still less acted upon. The very words "visiting" or "meetings of friends" suggest to most minds the idea of expense, domestic inconvenience, and a waste of time. Why should it be so? All kinds of social intercourse ought to be associated with the most pleasing ideas. They ought to be easily attainable, and readily arranged, and should entail little or no disarrangement of the usual domestic routine. Were will a few rich persons encourage their less wealthy brethren by systematically adopting in their entertainments a severe and almost Spartan simplicity? Such a simplicity would do them infinite honor, by tending to emancipate those less favored by the gifts of fortune from the supposed necessity of needless profusion and unrulled for expense. If such examples were to become prevalent, the consequence would be, that the apparent inequalities between rich and poor would be much softened down—there would be an absence of that painful, but irrational feeling, which constantly haunts many otherwise amiable persons, lest their mode of entertaining those whose incomes are ten or twenty times larger than their own may not be quite comme il faut—we should have less thought taken about mere trifles, and more about matters of higher import.—From the Companion, a series of pleasant rational Essays in the Machinery Economizer.

ANTS AS FOOD.

While ants, or termites, are eaten by various African tribes, both raw and boiled, and it is said the Hottentots "get into good condition on this diet." In India, the natives capture great quantities of these insects, which they mix up with flour, producing a kind of pastry which is purchased at a cheap rate by the poorer classes. Some of the Africans prepare large quantities of them for food, by parching them in kettles over a slow fire. In this condition they are eaten by handfuls as delicious food. The traveller, Smeathman, states that he has seen the natives in Guinea fill a large basket to be "delicate, nourishing and wholesome, resembling in flavor sugared cream, or sweet-almond paste." In Brazil, the abdomens of yellow ants are eaten by many persons. Humboldt states that the natives of South American countries, ants are mixed with resin, and eaten as a sauce. In Siam ants' eggs are considered a luxury, they are sent to table curried, or rolled in green leaves, mingled with fine slices or shreds of fat pork. In Sweden, ants are distilled along with rye, to give a flavor to the liquor produced thereby. Chemists have ascertained that ants secrete a pleasant kind of vinegar, or a peculiar acid called formic acid. We derive these facts from an article on "Useful Insects and their Products," in the Scottish Quarterly Journal of Agriculture.

YANKEE BROWN BREAD.

Two quarts of Indian meal.
Two quarts of rye meal.
Three pints of milk or water.
Two teaspoonfuls of salt.
Half a pint of strong fresh yeast.

Having sifted the rye and Indian meal into a large pan, make a hole in the middle, adding the salt. Boil the milk or water in a sauce-pan, and when scalding hot pour it on the meal, and stir the whole very hard. If too stiff, add a little more warm water. Let it stand till it becomes only of a lukewarm heat, then add the yeast. Knead the mixture into a stiff dough, and knead it long and hard for at least half an hour. Then cover the pan with a thick cloth that has been previously warmed, and set it near the fire to rise. When the dough is quite light, and cracked all over the top, take it out of the pan; divide the mass in half, make it into two loaves; knead each leaf well for ten minutes or more; and then cover and set them again near the fire, for half an hour. By this time the oven ought to be ready, put in the loaves directly, and bake them three hours and a half. This bread is considered very wholesome.

Should you find the dough sour, you may rectify it by kneading in a teaspoonful of pearlash, dissolved in a little warm water.—Selected.

AN ODD HUSBAND.—In November, 1730, Anne, the eldest daughter of George II. and Queen Caroline, was married to the Prince of Orange, of whom it is without a wife.

A man, the hideousness of whose appearance is said to have been only exceeded by some monster in a pantomime, or some ogre in a fairy tale. In giving him her hand, the Princess seems to have been entirely influenced by a feminine love of power. Her letter to her mother she once observed, "I would die to-morrow to be a queen to-day," and when her father spoke affectionately to her of the unguiliness of her lover's appearance, and told her that it was not yet too late to recede, she replied (with the spirit she said) even if he were a hobgoblin." The subsequent story of the Princess and her lover is that of the "Beauty and the Beast" over again. Lord Chesterfield tells us that he had as many "great and good qualities" as any of his ancestors; and accordingly, notwithstanding his loathing ugliness, the princess not only grew extremely fond of her husband, but is said to have been sensibly alive to his attentions to other women.

MARRIAGE.—It may be remembered that he once had a difficulty in London with our countryman, N. P. Willis, and a duel was seriously talked of. It was productive of no result, however, except one of the most humorous conceptions in all Marryat's fictions, the description of the "triangular duel" in "Midshipman Easy." A friend asked Marryat how he happened to let open that laughable incident, and he replied that it was "a good lead while it was meditating how he should right Willis. We wish that all duels might end as pleasantly.—Transcript.

☞ Mrs. Partington, bless her soul, is still alive and well, in spite of the extreme heat of the season. The Post says that, to use her own language, she "intended the connect of the Female Cemetary, the other evening, and some of the songs were extricated with touching pathogenes." She declares "the whole thing went off like a Packet-ham shot; the young angels sang like syrups, and looked like angels just out of paradise."

A HOME INDIAN.—An awkward fellow, in getting out from the upper end of an omnibus, the other day, made very free with other people, in trouble him to keep his balance. One person remarked that he was a savage; "yes," said another "he belongs to the Paw-haw tribe."—Bunker Hill Aurora.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

THE POTATO ROT SPREADING.

The steamship Washington arrived at New York on the 6th inst. She brings no later advices from Liverpool, and but twelve hours later from London.

The Steamship United States arrived at Southampton the same day the Washington left, and proceeded at once to Havre.

The same gloomy feeling prevails in London as at last advices.

The accounts from Ireland represent every thing as quiet in that country.

The weather at London and Liverpool continued very bad, and the potato crop is suffering dreadfully in consequence.

No change in the markets.

MACBETH.

Macbeth broke the law of hospitality in his attempt on Duncan's life. He murdered and slew the King at a place called Rothgowan, or the Smith's house, near Elgin, in 1039, and not, as has been supposed, in his own Castle of Inverness. The act was bloody, as was the complexion of the times; but in very truth, the claim of Macbeth to the throne, according to the rules of Scottish succession, was better than that of Duncan. As a King, the tyrant so much exclaimed against was, in reality, a just and equitable Prince. Early authorities show us no such persons as Banquo and his son Fleance, nor have we reason to think that the latter ever fled further from Macbeth than across the firth scene according to the stage direction. Neither were Banquo and his son ancestors of the house of Stuart. All these things are now known, but the mind remains pertinaciously the impressions made by the imposition of genius.—While the works of Shakspeare are read, and the English language exists, history may say what she will, but the general reader will only recollect Macbeth as the murderer of Duncan, and Duncan as the deformed murdered. The genius of Shakspeare having found the tale of Macbeth in the Scottish chronicles of Hollingshed, adorned with a lustre similar to that with which a lurid beam of the sun colors intents some fragment of a cloud, which, though shining at a distance with the lustre of a diamond, is, by a nearer investigation, discovered to be of no worth or estimation.—See Walter Scott.

THREE FAILURE OF NUMBER—1. To lisp in a baby's style, when the same words in an enlarging tone would please as well. The reverse should be the practice: the voice clearly emphatic, and each syllable distinctly articulated for imitation. 2. To tell of witches, ghosts, and goblins. 3. To direct a child to act like a man; whereas, it is not long becoming for a little boy to ape the man, but only to confess his dominion to his age. Every age has its peculiar decorousness.

Selected Poetry.

LIBERTY, EQUALITY, FRATERNITY AND HOW TO GAIN THEM.

FROM THE LONDON PUNCH SHOW.

I.

We want no flag, no drumming rag,
For Liberty to fight;
We want no blaze of murderous gas
To struggle for the right.
Our spouts and words are primed words,
The mind our butts pain;
We've won such victories before,
And so we shall again.

II.

We love so triumph sprung of force—
They stain her brightest scene:
'Tis not in blood EQUALITY
Learns her civil laws.
Our votes then on the people's heart
In language clear and plain;
Then do votes have moved the world before,
And so they shall again.

III.

We yield to none in earnest love
Of freedom's cause sublime,
We join the cry "FRATERNITY,"
We keep the march of time;
And yet we grasp our pike not spare
Our vile counterfeiters,
We've won without their aid before,
And so we shall again.

IV.

We want no aid of turncoats
To show a front to wrong!
We have a conclave in truth,
More durable and strong.
Calm words, gun thoughts, inflinching in ith,
Have never stir's in vain;
They've won our battles many a time,
And so they shall again.

V.

Peace, knowledge, progress, brotherhood—
The concert may come,
The bad deny; but we rely
To see their triumph near.
He wishes' groans shall lend our cause,
No blood of brethren stain;
We've won without such aid before,
And so we will again.

Selected Sketch.

THOMAS KENDALL'S FIRST NIGHT IN THE CITY.

FOUNDED ON FACT.

BY EVA MILFORD.

On a bright cowslipy morning in June, there was a little group standing at old Farmer Kendall's door, watching to catch the first glimpse of the Boston stage, coming over the hill; for Thomas, the farmer's son, was going to the great city, to purchase the goods with which to stock a new store, which was to be the wonder of his native village.

This had been a favorite plan with Thomas and now that he was one and-twenty, he seemed so much bent upon it, that the old farmer had at last consented, and even borrowed five hundred dollars for him, on his own personal security. To this loan was added a thousand dollars which had been left to Thomas by his grandfather, and which had been drawn from the bank of the neighboring town only the day before that on which the young man was to commence his journey.

The stage at last appeared on the brow of the hill, and little Net was immediately despatched to look for his brother in the garden, where he was saying farewell to his betrothed, the daughter of a neighboring farmer, to whom the young embryo merchant was much attached.

The parting was a tender, no doubt very interesting to the lovers, but not so much so to the reader, who now cut short by the abrupt communication from little Ned that the coach was coming, and that his brother must hasten to the house, or he would not be in time.

"Good bye, then, dearest Mary," said the young man; "I shall be back in a week, and then in another, you know what you have promised."

The lovers were at the house—there were parting speeches and admonitions, from father, mother, brothers, and sisters, a tender look from Mary and the young man was gone.

Leaving that happy family at home, to their peace and quiet life, let us follow the young trader to the great emporium of learning, business, and, alas! evil.

Thomas had never been in Boston, nor indeed out of his native State of Maine, and many were the cautious injunctions laid upon him by his father and among others, to be sure and deliver his letter of introduction to his father's old friend, Mr. Simpson, as soon as possible after his arrival.

"For then," said the old man, "he can give you advice about selecting your goods, and the best merchants to go to, for Boston is a dreadful place, and a young man may go astray there very easy."

Thomas promised and intended to fulfil; but when he arrived in Boston, of about noon the next day, he found that no mate date and rest before he could go to Mr. Simpson's house. As he sat in the coffee-room after his dinner, looking at the curious current of life which poured past the windows, he was addressed by a respectable-looking and middle-aged man, who observed to him:

"Rather an interesting scene that below, especially to a gentleman who has not seen much of the city."

"Very true; but how did you know that I had not seen much of the city?"

A slight smile of exultation curled the lip of the stranger, but was instantly gone, and he calmly answered:

"Oh, I can generally tell. But came up to my room, won't you, and take a good glass of old Madeira with me?"

"Thank you, sir," replied the young man, "but I never drink wine during the morning."

"Too mean, my dear young friend, that you never become intoxicated. I presume that a home you drink your mother's nice root beer, don't you?"

"Yes, sir," said Thomas, at the same time wondering very much how this stranger could know so much of his private affairs. "Yes, sir, I drink that; but what I mean was, that I never drink brandy, or rum, or any thing of that sort."

"No, indeed, I hope not," gravely replied the stranger, "and I should be the very last person to tempt you to it; but this Madeira of which I speak is extremely mild—a complete lady's wine; you might drink a whole bottle and not feel it in the least. But what I principally asked you up for was because your face reminds me so strongly of some old friend of mine, but who it is I cannot for my life remember. May I ask your name?"

"Thomas Kendall, sir."

"Good heavens! you must be the son of my old bosom friend and companion, Kendall—I hear that he had settled down into a steady, sober farmer, here in town?"

"Why, I didn't know that he was ever any thing else. But what is your name, sir? Perhaps I have heard him mention you."

"My name is Green—Charley Green, but I guess your father would not be likely to mention me to you, for he and I used to have some gay times together, and he would not care to tell you, lest I might weaken the effect of all the good counsel that he gave you, I suppose. But come along with me; I want to hear all about your father myself, and where you live, and all."

Thomas unwisely followed Mr. Green to state, mentally congratulating himself upon finding so soon a friend of his father's, and when Mr. Green produced the bottle of wine, and told him that his father had drank many a bottle of the like with him, he no longer hesitated, and when the first glass was gone, and Mr. Green filled it again, Thomas made no objection.

It was really marvellous to see in how very short a time the host had extracted from his guest all the particulars of his business in Boston, how much money he had with him, and to whom his letter of introduction was addressed.

"Ah yes, my good friend Simpson," exclaimed he, when the letter was examined. "I know his well, and shall be most happy to accompany you to his house, if you like."

"That's you, my dear fellow!" said Thomas who had become highly exhilarated with his unusual potations. "And we'll go right off, too."

"I think we had better have tea, first, about us?"

"Just as you say. I suppose the old gentleman will be taking a nap at present, and I don't know but it will be as well to wait a little."

"And in the meantime," resumed Mr. Green, "I'll take you with me, if you please, to a place where I have appointed to meet a friend, at just about this time. You will find it very entertaining place, I dare say."

"Why, where is it?"

"Oh, a place where most of our fashionable young men go to spend their spare evenings."

"Well, what do they do there?"

"Some talk, some read the newspapers, some play cards, and some—so and drink."

"Hurrah! let's go at once. Go it! I'll be fashionable, too."

"He's getting on," muttered Mr. Green, gazing at his prompt with a speculative expression of countenance; "but I must get him a little quieter before I carry him into the street."

"What a that you're saying?" asked the waiter, in a thick voice.

"I was saying that we would have some tea before we went out, for I always like to be regular at my meals."

"Charley Green" accordingly rang the bell, and had some tea brought up, and then, as Thomas had grown a little more quiet, both gentlemen sallied forth, and in a short time entered a fashionable looking house. On Mr. Green's ringing a few quaint words to the man who opened the door they were shown into a large saloon, magnificently furnished and lighted, where were assembled a number of young men, all busy with different games of cards. But the interest of gaming must have been in them diminished by their being too fitted for the task than myself, that I do not attempt it—on my object is only to tell a true story in as few words as may be.

An account of the transport old lady, an elderly looking gentleman, with a cigar in his mouth, came up, and holding out his hand to Thomas's companion, said—

"How do you do, Cuban?"

"Me done for thing, why will you persist in that therefore joke of calling me Cuban, because my name is Green. There are many things greener than oak trees, my friend; and by the way, allow me to introduce my friend, Mr. Kendall, to you."

Mr. Cutting wished almost impolitely as Mr. Green, or Cuban, and held out his hand familiarly to Thomas. He was, however, soon separated from this new acquaintance by his first friend, who asked him if he would not like to learn to play "poker," as the friend who had promised to meet him had not arrived.

Thomas readily consented, nor did he even start when his friend proposed that they should stake dollars instead of counters. A dreamier of wine was upon the table, and Mr. Green was careful that Thomas's glass should never be empty. They had played several games, and Thomas had already won and lost ten dollars, when the man who had opened the door for them, rushed into the room exclaiming—

"The police!—the police! They are at both doors and will be in, in another minute. The passage through the cellar is the only way left to escape."

There was now a general rush for the cellar. Thomas, hardly able to walk, was dragged along by his friend, Mr. Green, but upon emerging from the cellar, the fresh air deprived the young inebriate of his little remaining sense, and he sank upon the ground.

Mr. Green, who was a strong man, seized him in his arms and ran with him for some distance, but finding that the police were hotly pursuing him, he put his burden upon the ground and began to rifle his pockets—but before he had found anything more valuable than a pocket handkerchief, two police officers surround the master, and Mr. Green betook himself to his heels, and the worthy guardians of the city's peace followed so fast that they did not perceive the insensible form of the young man lying upon the side-walk.

When Thomas Kendall next became conscious of anything, he found himself lying in a nice bed, and in a room in which he had never been before. Everything was very neat and clean, but also very poor and coarse. Upon a chair near the fire, hung his coat and pantaloons, while at a table in the middle of the room, a grave looking woman, of about thirty, was ironing his linen. Thomas made no noise, but lay silently examining his hostess. She looked respectable and intelligent, and—to use a very hackneyed phrase—if "she was that had seen better days." The expression of her face was sad and grave.

After regarding her for some time, Thomas made a slight noise, which caused the woman to turn toward him.

"Good morning, sir," said she, softly.

"Good morning, madam," returned Thomas, in some confusion. "Will you be kind enough to tell me how I came here, and where I am?"

"You are in my one room, sir, and my name is Sarah Simpson, or as people generally call me, 'Widow Smith.' I go out to work by the day, and as I came home last night, I found you lying in the street, not many steps from this place. The lamp-throw full upon you, and I knew by the look of your face that you had not been used to it; for God help me, I have seen all the stages from the first glass," taken on our wedding day, to the time when I saw him in his coffin, a blasted unreasonable drunkard." And the widow wiped the tears from her eyes and went on. "And so I managed to get you into my house and put you into my own bed, for I was going to sit up with my neighbor's child, in the next room. And your clothes I have sponged and hung to the fire, one your shirt will be dried in another moment, and so I will leave you to dress yourself before you can see your breakfast, that I have been by the fire, keeping hot for you."

So saying, the kind woman left the room, and Thomas, rising from his bed, began clearly to put on his clothes. But suddenly the thought came into his head—where was his money? He had put it into his pocket on going out, the day before, by Mr. Green's advice, and now as he hurriedly felt in first one pocket, and then another, the conviction came upon his mind that it was lost, and that he was ruined.

Mechanically he finished dressing, and throwing himself into a chair, began to muse bitterly upon his prospects.

"I should not mind," said he, aloud, "my own honest dollars—it is that which my father has owed for me. Now, a part of the farm will have to be sold to pay it. And then I cannot marry his many a year. Perhaps Mary will have no more to say to me when she hears of this. How could I be foolish as to trust that man? How could I forget all my good principles and all the good instructions I have had? I wonder if it was or that robbed me? It could not be this woman. No, no, she is too kind and good; and yet it was a strong temptation to one in her circumstances."

At this moment the object of his thoughts entered the room and said:

"I forget to tell you that I took your wallet or money and your other things out of your pocket and put them in my bureau drawer;" then opening that repository, the good woman produced the articles.

Thomas snatched the wallet from her hand, and eagerly counted the money. All was there, and his countenance instantly swelled with joy at the certain security. He could not speak his gratitude, but silently pressing the woman's hand, and throwing a note of some value upon the table, he left her and hat and left the house.

He was found his way back to the hotel, and his first inquiry was for Mr. Green; but he was told that the gentleman had that morning left the house in company with a constable, to answer for knocking down one of the policemen who had prevented him from entering his house the previous night. The first thing Thomas did, was to present his letter of introduction; and so well was his business forwarded by Mr. Simpson, that at the end of the week he left the city with all the goods he had expected to obtain, and several hundred dollars in his trunk.

Soon after arriving at home, Thomas carelessly inquired of his father if he had ever been acquainted with a Mr. Charles Green. The old gentleman answered in the negative; but it was not for two years afterwards, when Thomas was well established as a merchant, and had his first child growing and laughing upon his knee, that either to father or wife heard the account of his "first night in the city."—Boston Traveller.

EPIGRAM ON MISS MELK.

I love Alcis for the grace
That adorns her form, but moreover her face
For her dark eye and dimpled cheek,
But more than all, because she's Melk
Why don't I wed her then, you cry?
Shall I be plain and tell you why?
Whatever Alcon was before,
When married, she'll be Melk no more!

FRANK TOBIN'S EMPHASIS.—Tobin tells the following anecdote of a countryman of his, named Barney. It is characteristic, very:

"Barney had served five years in the Infantry, and, after an honorable discharge, had re-shipped in the Dragoons. Barney was not a horseman, and the commanding officer was continually calling out—'Barney, turn your toes in.' The poor girl held of the words, and gave them to Barney as a caricipant.

"One day, the commanding officer spoke to him as usual, and the men laughed. Barney grew savage, galloped out from the ranks, and said, 'Lifthant, I want to come to an explanation with you, I've been five years in the service, and all the time it was 'Barney, turn your toes out,' now it's all the time, 'Barney, turn your toes in.' what's the reason, Lifthant?"

THE TALKING FISH.—A gentleman sent his cook servant to purchase him a fresh fish. He returned in a rush, and taking up a fish, began to smell it. The fishmonger, observing him, and eating the by-standers might catch the scent, exclaimed—

"Mails! you black rascal, what do you smell my fish for?"

"Me no smell your fish, massa."

"What are you doing then, sir?"

"Me talk to 'em, massa."

"And what do you say to the fish, my friend?"

"He ask him what news at sea, cat's all, cause."

"And what does he say to you?"

"He says he don't know; he no been dare one two week."

OUR GAME WON'T LIE.—A witness being called to give testimony in a certain court Down-East, had a lost short, came to the point very abrupt. Q. to follows.—"Mother said, that lad said, that Polly said, that Bob told her, that the one a man, but see a boy, that used a fuller run through the trout with a red striped flannel shirt, of a white colour, all climbed, checker—and one gale sou's ly, for the old woman has kicked 'em a hundred times for lying!"

FACILITY OF REPARTEE.—A printer one day observed that anything might be turned into rhyme, it dogged; upon which a friend, pointing to a stand in the street, upon which was painted the words, "Time is money to be sold," exclaimed, "Come, then, turn that into rhyme!" upon which the other, with infinite promptitude, redeemed his pledge, by writing, with chalk, on the board,—

For the Gentlemen.

THE CAPTAIN'S WIFE.

FROM "PETER SCHEMIL IN AMERICA."

Last October was a year, I arrived at New York with a cargo of teas from Canton; as soon as it was possible, I left the ship, and under the highest advantage, got out for my little nook of a village, on the Hudson, where my whole stock of human hopes and affections lay invested in a wife and three children. It is singular, perhaps, but so it is, that I never knew my road that anything so happen to my family, till I get on somedays, and then I can neither sleep nor eat till I get into port, and have seen my owners, and found out it all is well at home. I had the happiness to learn that my family had been increased, by a fine boy, born one month after my departure. You may guess my impatience to see him. I sent off a letter announcing my arrival, and the day on which I should be at home. My welcome was as joyous as I could have wished it to be. The boy was a noble fellow, a year old, and as like me as two peas. These are bright days of sunshine, which repay a sailor for some of the storms of his ocean life, and of which his owners, though they get all the profits of the voyage, can't deprive him, though they would do so if they could—for they grudge every thing to their ship masters.

After I had been at home three days, I returned to finish up the voyage with the owners, and hand up the ship. This done, I returned, bag and baggage, to my wife, to make a long stay at home. The upshot of the matter was, I had taken a letter of interest to captains' wives, and I had procured for myself all the presents Canton produces. Two pieces of rich silk for dresses, and a set of carved chessmen, and things of that sort. I saw a cloud of disappointment on my wife's face, but she said nothing; and so the matter passed off. But when Sunday morning came, my wife was exceedingly cross, and declared she wouldn't go to church, though she was as regular as the sexton; from 'a was and out. "Five nothing to wear." I thought it very odd, but said nothing, and, taking my little boy and girl, set off for church. Everybody was glad to see me, and I quite forgot all was not right at home, till I found my way back into my house. There my wife stood, ready to scold the children for muddying their shoes, and would have spanked them right on the spot, if I had not immediately interfered, with a good deal of firmness, in word and look. The children were undressed, and dinner served, and nothing on the table was cooked fit to eat. And as the week passed on. My coffee was thick as mud—my turkeys done to a crust, and I well knew the devil was about to be let loose; but for why, I couldn't guess. In the meanwhile, my wife's sister, who had been a sort of ship's cousin upon board me ever since my marriage, looked all the while as demure as a Connecticut deacon under the parish pulpit, and gave no sign to show me what all this was about.

On the next Sunday afternoon, as I was sitting with my wife and children, I heard a knock at the door, and called out, "Come in," and in came my old friend, Captain Thomas Bowline, and his wife, the only one living in the world I knew that returned the week before me from Calcutta, and we were the only one-footing men of the place, and though our wives were neighbors, it so happened that we had not been home, at the same time, for six years.

I was delighted to see them both, and my wife, I thought, was wonderfully cool, though exceedingly polite. I soon forgot all about her manner, in the pleasure of talking over our several fortunes since we had parted—and as we had not been long in having been absent from the village since our coming home, we had many things to talk over. Tony made a long call, and when they went away, my wife went up to her room, and I saw no more of her; for when I was ready, the next morning, I found she had a headache, and had gone to bed.

The next Sunday morning matters wore no more pleasant aspect than they had done, and when the first church bell began to ring, my wife burst out into a fond of tears, and set off for her chamber. I followed her, and there she lay on the bed, in a regular fit of hysterics. When she came to herself, I asked: "Why, what on earth in all this about?" She rose, and putting her hands on my shoulders, looked me full in the face, and said,—"Captain Weatherfield, if you don't know, you ought to know," and I waited down under her look, like a boy caught in the act of playing truant.

There are few men who, after a long voyage, could see any cause which appeared to them, I felt some rascal had been telling stories out of school but, for the life of me, couldn't conceive what it could be. And then my wife went off again in another fit, worse than the first. I took off her stays, and her feet were as cold as ice. As I rubbed them, I conjured up all the circumstances of my voyage, and they were not half so pleasant as I could have wished them. But finding it impossible to restore my wife, I ran down stairs, ironing the doors all open behind me, to the kitchen, to make some mulled wine, and there was my wife's sister, with her demure face, which helped to irritate me no little. I called for wine and spices, and a porringer, and while it was heating, she began by saying: "She wished her sister knew how to treat a husband as he deserved to be treated—that if she was a wife, she should know how to prize a man who did everything a man could do to please her." I was in no humor to hear my wife abused, and so I burst out upon her in a rage, and told her "I believed she was a noisy in the grass, and that I had rather have her sister ten thousand such hypocrites as she was that if there was any mischief made between me and my wife, I knew who to thank for it." She tilted up her head and said: "She believed she men were fools, and of all fools I was the great est." This brought out a spirited alteration, in which I spoke my mind pretty plainly. As soon as I had heated the wine, I decanted it into a tumbler. My wife's sister had recommended vinegar, but I told her "I would leave the vulgar crust all to herself; I knew a better thing than that for my wife."

On my way up-stairs, I thought I heard my wife's footsteps about the chamber, but, on entering, I found her lying on the bed, crying in a very sensible way; so I found no difficulty in persuading her to drink the mulled wine, and then I set to work rubbing her feet again. She now begin to sob, and to say, "She didn't deserve to have such a good husband—I was too good for her—nobody would love her—nobody ought to love her." I felt encouraged to leave rubbing her feet, and to take to rubbing her hands, and to kiss her, begging her to tell me "what was the matter." And then she fell to crying again, and sobbing; she was "she couldn't tell me, for I should hate her, as she deserved to be hated," and all that sort of thing. The more she distressed herself, the more I pressed it upon her, and was on the point of using a stern tone, and asking her for firmness' but, luckily, I did no such thing; for, after pretending to struggle, she at last sobbed out: "Captain Bowline had brought home his wife a cashmere shawl, and I had only brought her a silk dress." "Is that all?" I exclaimed, and kissed her as heartily as ever I was kissed before. And then she quietly asked me to turn to complain, to tell her "how unlike she had been to keep me in such suspense all the while," and then came her turn to put her arms about my neck, and to kiss me, and beg to be forgiven. All which, I assure you, was a very agreeable winding up of this scene.

I was not long in discovering the whole secret of my wife's grievance. She thought I didn't love her as much as Captain Tom loved his wife, because I brought her China silks from Canton, instead of an India shawl; but I explained to her that cashmere shawls came from one part of the world, and silks from another; but there women believe shawls are made everywhere beyond the seas.

Every woman has her Napoleon Bonaparte, and my wife's was Mrs. Tom Bowline, and the thought of being outshone by her at church had caused all this commotion, now so happily ended in a clearing up shower. I told my wife her wishes should be gratified as soon as ever I had it in my power to do so, and intended that this should be done as soon as ever I could find a shawl to my mind.

By dinner time, my wife was dressed, and as we sat down to dinner, she looked as happy as a bride—and so for myself, I never was happier in my life. My wife's sister looked on with some astonishment—and I was surprised to see, for the first time, that my wife spoke to her with a little tinge of sharpness. I had reason to believe afterwards, that my wife, hearing our loud talking, had come to the head of the stairs and overheard us. It was one of those few instances in which listeners hear good things of themselves; and resulted in my wife's sister finding the house too hot for her; so she married herself off to a soldier, and removed to Babylon.

But, to go on with my story, the next day my wife and I set out for New York, she to have her China silks made up; and so for myself, I really had no other business than to accompany her and buy a shawl, which should outshine Mrs. Tom Bowline's. Fortunately I found my old friend Briggs, of Salem, just in from Calcutta, with a half-dozen magnificent shawls, of which he allowed me to take my pick, at cost price, and a bill made out at my price I pleased to have affixed. So I modestly told him he might receipt a bill for one at seven hundred and fifty dollars, for which I paid him three hundred. This I had safely stowed away in my trunk as a coat I had been buying. I purchased, besides, a fine satin bonnet, with a plume that drooped down on her shoulder in the most bewitching style, and she was perfectly delighted with her visit. We remained in town a week, when her silks came home from the milliner's. Her dresses were just as she liked to have them—a most rare thing, I can tell you—and so to the bonnet, no language could express her admiration of it. And so we reached home on Saturday night, perfectly well pleased with everything in the house and out of it.

The next day was rather a bright, frosty day, and my wife, dressed in her beautiful bonnet and rich silk dress, certainly looked charming. She had a pretty fur cape on, and, with a sweet smile, said:

"Now, dear, let us go, for the bell is tolling."

"Why, my dear, where's your shawl?"

"Oh, I don't need a shawl to-day."

"But, love, just please me, and wear one."

She was, for an instant, a little displeased, but quelling the feeling, she ran up stairs, and there lay my splendid present on the bureau. She came running down with it in her arm, and throwing her arm around my neck burst into tears. As I knew these tears did her good, I let her cry them out—and so soon as they could be dried away, she put on her shawl, found it all right, and, though I say it, there never was a finer looking one a happier woman in the world than my wife at that moment.

We walked up to the head of the broad aisle, in presence of the whole congregation, to our pew next to the minister's, and it would have done your heart good to have heard her voice, making the responses; she seemed especially desirous that all the congregation should know what a miserable sinner she was, and how, "she had done the things she ought not to have done," and when the service was over, she had a kind word for every one; especially was she anxious for the health of Mrs. Bowline, and all her children; and on the church steps she lingered to speak to all our neighbors, high and low, far and near; so it was pretty well advertised, before we got home, that my wife had a splendid shawl, the prettiest bonnet, and the richest silk dress ever seen in that parish. As for poor Mrs. Tom Bowline, her dinner was spoilt for one day. Nor was she the only woman made miserable by my wife's finery. Many an old cloak and hat, enough to last another winter, was now taken off with a feeling of absolute loathing; the wives of all the parish praised me up to their husbands as "such a kind man," "no one never to see his wife look so well as somebody;" and the husbands blamed their fathers for some new bonnets and shawls, so that I was abundantly abused on all hands by the men, for spending all my money on my wife's back; and when the secret leaked out what my wife's dinner was, she was almost as much abused by her, where my wife was sure to find it—the admiration of the women, and the contempt of the men, rose to the highest pitch. One thing is certain, never had the parish church seen such a fashionable air as my wife's shawl and bonnet. Never did the capsize, with a thump on the table, which made the glasses dance,) there's my method of treating a woman such insistency. And I will give you, sir, (addressing the Priest,) the exact proportions of vinegar to be put into a pint of wine, and in your next edition of conjugal love, I beg you will put it in as Captain Weatherfield's remedy. Woman will sometimes be cross-grained—it can't be helped; but, instead of breaking up all relations of husband and wife, mother and child, the most terrible of all calamities, let everybody try my prescription, viz. a cashmere shawl—and I pledge you my life it will work wonders. There need never be another divorce on that score—don't you think so?

MIRABEAU.

There have been men in particular ages, who might be considered as concentrating within themselves all their country's characters, when they represented, at the same time, both the good and evil traits. Themistocles was the very impersonation of all the virtues and vices of Athens, in his day. The moral antithesis, Alcibiades, was a still more remarkable compound of the manifold virtues, vices, foibles, &c., of this same Athens, at a later and more degenerate period. In looking over France, during the session of the National Assembly, we shall find the celebrated Mirabeau, without doubt, to be the representative of that epoch; and if Louis XIV. could say, in his day, "I am the nation!" Mirabeau could say, in his latter days, with more truth, "I am the National Assembly."

This extraordinary man had been born among the nobility, and been maltreated. He had experienced every kind of tyranny from his very birth—the of his own father, of the government, and of the tribunals. He was thus trained to despise the government, and the upper class of French society. He had seen all manner of men, from drill sergeants to prime ministers, from his uncles of the jails of Pontarlier to princes and kings. He had made himself notorious by his dissolute manners and his quarrels. There speaks of him as frightful with ugliness and genius; yet no man had more success, or was successful in them. His character was so low, at the meeting of the states general, that there was a murmur in the Assembly when he first ventured to take his seat. Yet, no sooner did the eccentric man appear in the tribune, that his power became manifest.

He was immeasurably superior to every mind with which he came in contact in the Assembly. He had, in fact, no second—it was Eclipse first and the rest nowhere. From the member that was barely tolerated, he soon became the member that was greeted by the loudest applause ever heard by every orator. Proud of his high qualities, and jeeting over his vices, by turns haughty and supple, he won some by his flattery, awed others by his energies, and led all to hide in his train by the extraordinary influence of his genius. Of the Abbe Maury, the leader of the note street, he used to say, "When he is on the right side, we debate; when he is on the wrong, I crush him." His sarcasm, irony, originality, were so great, that everybody was afraid of him in the tribune. The dictatorship at last, no being able to meet him in debate, made an effort to get rid of him by duel. Many sent him challenges, but he always refused, merely noting down their names in his pocket-book. "It is not fair," said he, in regard to one of his opponents, "to expose a man of talent like me, against a blockhead like him." What is very extraordinary in such a country as France, this conduct did not bring him into contempt, or even cause his courage to be doubted. There was something so martial in his mind, so bold in his manner, that no one could impute cowardice to him. He made partisans everywhere—among the people—in the very convent, to crown the measure of his greatness, so soon as he learned the secret of his power, and saw the extent that was opened to him, he suddenly became one of the hardest working men who have ever appeared on the stage of action. "If I had not lived with him," says Dumont, "I should never have known what a man can make of one day." A day for this man was more than a week or a month for others. The mass of things he guided on together was prodigious; from the—homing to the executing, not a moment was lost The fact is, that he at last, tough as was his physique of frame, over worked himself, and died from fever generated by his excessive labors.—Southern Quarterly Review.

WASTED WEALTH

Whence do all those vast sums of money annually round their boundaries show that an amount of the world's population, unemployed by industrious labourers, work or any, positions and in other, would seem consumed the physical capacity of the earth to sustain its?

Our philosophy, instead of watching with apprehension the increase of the world's population, would rather concern itself with the world's undeveloped and wasted wealth. There is a degree of waste at all times, which, if remedied, would not only make the wants and necessities of the present generation, but supply also the probable increase of the generations that are to succeed us.

In the first place, we think of the vast multitude of able-bodied, sound-minded men, who are unemployed in any useful productive occupation—men who are continually assisting to consume, but never aiding to produce, any portion of the world's wealth. As labor is the foundation of wealth, the amount of the latter will never correspond with the degree of the former. There will be as much food as now, and more, if every man, woman, and child, were to eat more. There will be as more dwellings for men to live in than human labor exerts—and so of every other thing that constitutes this world's wealth.—The unemployed, non producing portions of mankind, are not so many idle machines, which, if they produce nothing, consume nothing. On the contrary, the unemployed of the human family consume as much as the employed, and help to diminish the common stock of the world's wealth—If the surplus wealth, over and above the own wants of the producers, which is the only proposed consumers of that surplus be unnecessary, then of course cease want, poverty, distress.

This is our present condition. Large numbers are living on the labors of others, and at the same time produce nothing. Look, for example, at the standing armies of the world, or of Europe. Look at England; several hundreds of thousands of sound, able bodied men are taken from the plough, the workshop, the factory, where they are usefully employed as mere producers, and are kept in a situation where they consume as much as more than ever, while they make not a single blade of grain or grass to grow, nor in any other mode do they contribute to increase the property or wealth of the country. So it is in Russia, in Austria, in Prussia, in France—in all, several millions of men shut up in the armies and navies of Europe, and doing absolutely nothing but performing certain military evolutions.

Think again of the multitude of idlers and non-producers in fashionable life in all countries—think of the tens of thousands, the millions, perhaps, who, from the cradle to the grave, never perform an useful service, simply because they are not compelled to. And then think of the multitudes more, others of the field, fifers of the workshop, pillers of the tavern, of the village, of the city; number them, if any arithmetic will do it, and say what deduction must be made from the world's wealth on their account.

The unemployed are not alone in draining off the results of labor and labor. As if their influence were not enough, they are joined and aided by all the misemployed—by those of every name and sort whose mission is to destroy, to lay waste; in which category and bad company one cannot help placing the Alexanders, and Cæsars, and Napoleons, great and little, whose trade has been war, and whose glory takes its measure from the extent of territory blackened and blasted, the lives sacrificed, and the amount of mischief accomplished.—When we think how often the ploughshare of ruin has been driven over the earth, and recall the history of desolation, mischief and death, inflicted not by internal, but human agency, is it to be wondered at that this world is comparatively poverty-stricken? What if all the destroyers of human prosperity had been, on earth, employed in developing the earth's resources—in accumulating wealth—in building railroads and canals—in reclaiming waste lands, and fertilizing desert places—in improving the arts and sciences, and in cultivating the human mind and heart?
